Together with other women she sat in the Ezrah Nashim, which was situated in an inner balcony on the second floor, facing the Holy Ark. Suddenly the balcony collapsed, falling down upon the floor below.

When she came to she was in a Polish military hospital. "You see what is left of my beautiful face" she laughed. "A Polish doctor insisted on saving my life, whatever for? I wish he had failed." She sobbed quietly for a while and then said: "What a laugh, to survive the Nazis without a scratch and to end up like this!"

"So here I am, frightening people away wherever I go. Needless to say, I can't get a job, as no one would hire me for any kind of work. That's why they have dumped me in a God forsaken hostel in Jaffa."

My mother tried to cheer her up by evoking memories from the past, when she used to come to my grandmother's. They both laughed, remembering some funny events.

Listening to them, I learned that Gitta had, in fact, been my grandmother's help, who used to come in to help her with some light house chores.

Coming from a very poor and simple family, she had to learn even the basics, such as ironing clothes, and my grandmother taught her everything. In addition to the money she gave her, my grandmother insisted that Gitta should learn to become a lay-nurse in a nearby hospital, and my grandmother paid for her tuition. "She made a human being of me, but look at me now, what good is it to me now?"

The sun was setting, the room darkening slowly. When my mother got up from her couch, Gitta said "No, please don't turn on the light." "But I want us to have supper." "No, I must go before it gets too dark, one of my eyes is made of glass, so..."

As they were standing at the door, my father arrived. He took one look at her and said "Gitta!" She gave him her hand and he shook it and said: "I heard you had arrived in Israel, but I did not know where."

Gitta apologized for having taken up so much of my mother's time. Taking her hand and asking her to come again soon, mother slipped some money into her palm, and then wrote down the exact name and address of her hostel in Jaffa.

When she was gone, my father remarked that he had known for some time that she had arrived in Israel, also about her face, but he did not mention it because he did not want my mother to search for her.

"But why?" asked my mother, "because of her frightening face?" "That too" said my father, "But mainly because I did not want you to take her in as our guest." "But she is so miserable, and alone" said mother vehemently.

My father looked at my direction, making sure I was absorbed in my book, and whispered to my mother: "Do you know how she managed to survive? She was a whore!" spitting the last word with contempt.

Mother was silent for a moment and then spoke very quietly, suppressing her anger by emphasizing each word: "I saw her hands, she had worked hard in order to survive. No doubt about that. If she had to do something else, in addition to her hard work, to stay alive, who are we to judge her? Is there one human being on God's good earth who could be sure how he'd have behaved under similar circumstances?" "And anyway, this kind of work is now out of the question for her," she added quickly with a bitter smile.

The following morning my mother went to the Jewish Agency to arrange for Gitta to be transferred from the hostel in Jaffa to a hostel in our neighborhood in Tel Aviv.

The mother of the bride

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Everyone knows how the father of the bride is supposed to react to his daughter's wedding: He gets slightly muddled, forgets his lines, acts frantic, and in the end, has not one but two movies made about his tribulations on the way to the chupah. But the mother of the bride is supposed to stay in charge of the event, maintaining her cool when all others are losing theirs.

This summer we celebrated the first wedding in our family (since ours, the parents'). It was a lovely wedding: The chupah was set up next to a stream that flows by the synagogue, with sunshine and flowers, almost as if Disney himself had choreographed it. No one lost the rings, the glass broke on schedule, the music was perfect and the setting idyllic. The food was terrific and the guests threw themselves into the nonstop klezmer music courtesy of Yitzchak Perlman, with such abandon that people are still talking about it.

The speeches made everyone cry. The father of the bride recalled our daughter's childhood with affection and wry humor, so that she enjoyed the reminiscences as much as we did. The groom's roast was no less loving, and we all wondered how we managed to have two such great kids! Instead of the usual clanging of glasses to indicate that guests wanted to see the bride and groom kiss, we had whole tables rising to sing compositions created on the spot. It was very hectic and completely wonderful.

The bills are paid and the pictures are ordered. Now we have time to reflect on what has happened.

It wasn't exactly like that at my wedding. I'm not sure what it was like. I must have been in a state of suspended animation. I remember practically nothing – except that the glass was really a light-bulb and the air conditioning broke. This was in August in New York City. Need I say more?

But this wedding, well, I'll never forget one minute of it. And since I didn't have much time to reflect before, I can do so now. This is what is on a mother's mind.

All our children are special, each one a first edition, as their kindergarten teacher put it many years ago. This one, like her father, has a mathematician's approach to life, coupled with an intense sense of right and wrong and a determination to make a difference in this world. I have no anxiety about her life plans, and the husband she has chosen (or who chose her, however you want it) can complement her in many ways.

Each has made sacrifices to create this bond and each brings to the marriage values which, in this era of cynicism and selfishness, are truly a joy.

It is not easy to marry today. Oh, the ceremony is the fast and easy part. But both these young people have seen many marriages collapse – some almost immediately, some after decades. Today we don't send our children out with the blithe assumption that after the ball is over, they'll live happily ever after. Not without a great deal of work, and no one knows what works.

That's the scary part. It remains a mystery how a couple remain married, just as what has torn them apart often can't be imagined.

Advice seems silly. What keeps a couple together and makes for a marriage where each partner is content? Despite libraries of books on marriage, the perfect formula remains unknown.

I had parents whose marriage was a wonder from the first. My mother, a college graduate and mathematics teacher, was an accomplished musician, and the Protestant equivalent of a Litvak (think Church of England). My father was more like a Chassid (think Methodist): chalk and cheese. But their 52 years together was a love affair from first to last. My children should be so lucky as to create this kind of lifetime relationship.

Upon reflection, how do I feel? Exhilarated that my daughter and son-in-law have begun to build a household among the Jewish people.

Delighted to welcome them as a Mr. and Mrs. to the holidays about to begin.

Pleased that we will spend part of the holiday in their home. Grateful for health and the fact that they both have jobs. Hopeful that her siblings will find life partners who value them as my daughter's husband loves her.

Sorry that we didn't hand them a more peaceful and clean earth for their children.

Regretful that their grandparents were not alive to join in the celebrations.

And most of all, deeply contented that two such people will have the chance to experience a lifetime partnership with all its attendant joys and sorrows, just as we have had. I would not want anything else for them.

"Other" issues affecting Israelis

By Bruce Elman in Edmonton

Twice in the past decade, my family has enjoyed the privilege of spending a sabbatical year in Jerusalem thanks to the support of the Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies at Hebrew University. I lectured in the faculty of law, my children went to "regular" public schools, and my wife studied at an ulpan. We shopped at Machane Yehuda, and strolled along the Midrachov. We went to parent/teacher meetings, and we davened at the local shul (even though we did not understand either the principal or the rabbi).

Israelis are addicted to news – television, radio and newspapers. Israelis hurry home to watch the television news; passengers on the buses quiet down when the news comes on the radio; and Israelis must buy more newspapers per capita than any other people in the world, or so it seems. So we started to read the paper religiously. During our first sabbatical, in 1988-89, Israel was in the throes of the intifadah, and the newspapers were filled with it. I stopped reading the intifadah stories and turned my attention to other issues.

Our second sabbatical, 1995-96, was two years after Oslo. Israel was handing over control of West Bank cities to the Palestinians. The initial euphoria had worn off, however. But still, the papers were obsessed with Oslo, the peace process, and ultimately, with what became known as "peace and security."

I got tired of these stories. They overshadowed numerous other interesting stories. In my view, the press was obsessed with peace and security to the relative exclusion of other important issues. Eventually, however, it dawned on me that the culprit here was not the press, but the country as a whole – peace and security was paramount; all else was not merely secondary, it was meaningless.

Five years after Oslo, the situation remains the same. The importance of peace and security for Israel cannot be seriously challenged, but by the same token, other matters cannot be simply ignored. Here are three of my favorite issues. These are quality-of-life issues that affect the lives of all Israelis:

• Road safety: Far too many Israelis either die or are seriously injured in road accidents. The number of traffic fatalities, as I recall, dwarfs the number of soldiers killed in military or quasi-military action. The first half of 1998 showed an 11.3 percent increase in road accidents. Add in the facts that a sizable percentage of the country only drives six days a week, and the incidence of accidents caused by drunk driving is very low, and you have nothing short of a crisis. Perhaps it is a failure in the licensing process or in the enforcement of the laws or, maybe, the sentencing practices of the courts is at fault. In any event, something must be done about it.

• The environment: You land at Ben-Gurion Airport, and as you are driving to Tel Aviv, you roll down the window to smell the orchard fragrance in the air. If the wind is blowing in your direction, however, your nostrils are filled with the stench from the mountain-like landfill site at Hiriya.

Hiriya was recently closed and now the site must be rehabilitated. No one is quite sure which ministry is responsible for that task. Incidentally, the replacement site at Rotem will not be ready for 14 months. Other snippets: 88 percent of gas stations in Israel do not have standards on groundwater pollution prevention. Recently, there was a fire at the Ramat Hovav national hazardous waste disposal site. After battling the blaze for five hours, firefighters gave up and decided to let the fire burn itself out. In mid-August, vacationers were ordered to leave the beaches of Eilat when the city's main sewage line collapsed.

• Crime: In spite of denials by the police inspector general, crime rates in Israel are, apparently, rising. Overall, there was a 12.5 percent increase in the crime rate for the first half of 1998. The worrisome rise in crime and violence was noted by President Ezer Weizman in his address to a gathering celebrating the 50th anniversary of the Israeli Supreme Court. One crime prevention plan was rejected because it used the Green Line as a border – peace and security, ideology and politics interfering with crime prevention.

Whether 11 percent or 13 percent of the West Bank is given over to Palestinian control may be important to the future security of the state. I do not know. But I do know that it cannot be an excuse to neglect safe roads, crime-free neighborhoods, clean drinking water, and efficient garbage and sewage disposal. Oslo should not obscure other important issues.

Quintessential underdogs

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

At the centre of our Yom Kippur confessions lie not only deeds that need repentance but also attitudes we cherish. It is often easier to repent something we have done than to change the basic attitudes that led to the deed in the first place.

Recently, I made mention of Thomas Cahill's book The Gifts of the Jews. In it, he enumerates 10 important innovations that were introduced to the world by our people. One of them was concern for the underdogs. It is a basic teaching of our religion to make sure that the weakest elements in society – the Torah notes widows, orphans and strangers as examples – are looked after and received with love and generosity.

Most readers of this column are the children or grandchildren of "underdogs." Their forebears came as refugees or poor immigrants; very few arrived with earthly goods to smooth their path in an unknown world. Much has changed since those days. I am glad to say that our society has developed a sense of compassion for refugees which, however, is in danger of disappearing. It is part of our Jewish responsibility to reawaken it. I therefore deem it appropriate to transmit to you the spirit of an editorial that appeared some time ago in the Vancouver Sun:

"Refugees whose claims have been investigated and verified will now be eligible for income-assistance benefits beyond the previous, minimal hardship assistance. The provincial Ministry of Human Resources' change of policy is wise. It will benefit all parties.

"Under the changes announced this week, those refugees can now receive job training, English tutoring, medical, dental and pharmacare services, child care and special assistance in finding employment such as help with transportation and clothing.

"These are not applicants for refugee status – they've already been accepted by Canada under our United Nations conventions. MOSAIC, an immigrant advocacy and integration organization, says it may take a year or more for the immigration department to process the paperwork.

"The new rules do not increase their monthly stipend (for a single man, $500 a month) but offer a better, earlier chance to find a productive place in Canada.

"Refugees represent the full range of society, including people who have had to leave behind families and careers to begin new lives. Why leave them waiting in limbo?

It not only makes good sense, it also makes for good religion. I have repeatedly stressed this theme in writing this column. The very word "refugee" awakens in me memories of my own arrival in North America. It was the midst of the Great Depression, and my earthly goods amounted to 40 cents. Bread lines were everywhere and "Brother, can you spare a dime?" was more than a line in a song – it was bitter reality.

We Jews have been refugees ourselves for so long that compassion for them ought to be incised on the tablets of our hearts.

Mandela's refusal to visit Israel due to policy shift

Nelson Mandela, president of the first black majority government in South Africa, visited Ottawa last week, addressing parliament and becoming the first overseas leader to be appointed to the Order of Canada.

Since his election in 1994, Mandela has been a world traveller, having accepted invitations from numerous countries, including Libya and Egypt. But he has studiously avoided one country – Israel.

He does not lack an invitation. Mandela, the avatar of the civil rights struggle in apartheid South Africa, was officially invited to Israel by President Ezer Weizman when he attended Mandela's inauguration in Johannesburg four years ago.

A date for a belated visit was finally set for August 1996. But the trip was postponed on the grounds that Mandela, now 80, was not feeling well. A South African diplomat in Washington said the visit might be rescheduled to October. But two years have elapsed since Mandela's cancellation, and though he accepted an honorary degree from Ben-Gurion University of the Negev in 1997, he will probably not set foot on Israeli soil any time soon.

By all accounts, Mandela does not wish to visit Israel as long as Benjamin Netanyahu is prime minister.

At a recent meeting of the Non-Aligned Movement in Durban, South Africa, Mandela said, "We should not allow the narrow, chauvinistic interests of the current administration in Israel to block the prospect of a permanent and just peace throughout the Middle East."

Netanyahu was so offended by this statement that he let it be known that he would not seek a meeting with Mandela when the United Nations General Assembly reconvened in New York City last month.

Their strained relationship is symptomatic of a shift in South Africa's policy toward Israel since the advent of Mandela's presidency. South Africa today is far more critical of Israel's policies than it was in the not so distant past. For example, the South African foreign ministry recently called on Israel to refrain from expanding settlements beyond the Green Line and to implement agreements signed with the Palestinian Authority.

During much of the apartheid era, when Mandela languished in a prison off the coast of Cape Town, Israel generally had close political, economic and military ties with South Africa, a fact which did not go unnoticed in the African National Congress, led by Mandela.

Much to South Africa's irritation, Israel regularly condemned apartheid, the system of institutionalized racial segregation. But its overall embrace of South Africa – home to Africa's largest Jewish community – antagonized some of the leaders of the African National Congress, whose cause was visibly backed by nations like Syria, Iraq and Libya and by the PLO.

Due to Arab support, the African National Congress came out strongly in favor of a Palestinian state and advocated a withdrawal of Israeli forces from the territories.

Mandela himself was doubtless miffed by Israel's friendship with the former South African regime. But he did not allow his visceral feelings to blur his intellectual view of Israel and Zionism.

In 1990, the year he was released from his long imprisonment, Mandela said: "If Zionism means the right of Israel to occupy lands of other countries like the Golan Heights, West Bank and Gaza Strip, then I condemn that. But if Zionism means the desire of the Jewish community to have their own state, then I support that."

In keeping with this somewhat nebulous formulation, the new South Africa has established diplomatic relations with all Arab states as well as Iran, supported the PLO's campaign for statehood in the West Bank and Gaza, and maintained cordial but not special ties with Israel.

The first African National Congress delegation visited Israel in January 1993, and South Africa's foreign minister, Alfred Nzo, paid a visit to Israel in September 1995. A few months later, the South African defence minister, Pierre Steyn, held top-level meetings with his Israeli counterparts in Jerusalem.

But in July 1997, in a show of dissatisfaction with Israeli policies, South Africa's Minister of Police Sidney Mufimdi refused to meet with Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani after arriving in Israel en route for a meeting with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat in Gaza.

Mandela, who has warm relations with South African Jews, has been open to meeting Israeli ministers, though not in Israel itself. After the 1993 Oslo accords were signed, he had brief encounters with the then Israeli foreign minister, Shimon Peres, in New York and Lisbon. And at his inauguration, he made a point of meeting with Weizman before greeting any other of the heads of state.

On the minus side, there have been several developments which have been of great concern to Israel.

There have been reports that South Africa is sharing nuclear technology with Iran. South Africa maintains that its ties with Iran are purely economic. In the past year, the Iranian president and foreign minister have visited Pretoria.

Almost two years ago, South Africa said it intended to sell Syria a $650-million tank-firing system. After U.S. protests, Mandela dropped the sale.

Israel Radio, in 1996, reported that Hezbollah has five training camps in South Africa. "That's just unthinkable," said Mandela's spokesperson, flatly denying the story.

Maybe so. But such blips in Israel's relations with the old South Africa rarely, if ever, occurred.

Zionist goals

In a speech delivered to the Histadrut labor federation in 1922, David Ben-Gurion, a founding father of Israel, declared: "The one great concern that should govern our thoughts and work is the conquest of the land and building it up through extensive immigration. All the rest is mere words and phraseology."

David Ben-Gurion

With this clarion call, Ben-Gurion clearly and unambiguously spelled out the overriding goals of the Zionist movement in Palestine. What he meant was that nationalism, taking the form of a Jewish state, took precedence over socialism, the establishment of a just society. The founders of Zionism were inspired by the vision of a socialist state. But according to Hebrew University political scientist Zeev Sternhell, universalistic ideals interested Ben-Gurion and the other leaders of pre-state Israel only insofar as they served the nationalist agenda.

In his meticulously-researched book, The Founding Myths of Israel (Princeton University Press), Sternhell contends that mainstream Zionism from the end of the Second Aliyah in 1914 to the emergence of the Labor party in 1968 was a case of national objectives triumphing over social ones. It is a persuasive, though not entirely novel, thesis.

Using primary and secondary sources, Sternhell claims that the labor movement never portrayed itself as an alternative to capitalism, and that the kibbutz, for all its socialistic trappings, strengthened Israel's capitalist economy. As Berl Katznelson, a Zionist worthy said, the kibbutzim were founded not to forge a socialist utopia but to lay the groundwork for national independence.

Ben-Gurion believed that Zionism was compatible with socialism. And perhaps it may have been at one point. But to Sternhell, there was an unbridgeable gap between these two forces, and in the final analysis, nationalism subsumed socialism.

Time to appreciate what we possess

By RABBI MOSHE J. YERES

With Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur behind us, the feelings of solemnity and reverence of the High Holy Days recede into the background and are immediately replaced by the joy of yom tov celebration. Sukkot, of all the holidays, symbolizes simchah, hanpiness par excellence. The Torah enjoins us vesamachta bechagecha, the Amidah liturgy calls the holiday zman simchatenu, and the celebrations in ancient (and modern) Jerusalem are termed simchat beit hasho'eva. The midrash even goes as far as intimating that we wave the lulav on Sukkot as a joyous victory salute to our happiness.

Understandably, confident as we are that HaShem has heard our prayers on Yom Kippur and granted our request for the coming year, we ought to be happy. Yet I cannot but wonder how God can command us to be happy. What if I do not feel like I am happy? How can HaShem adjure me to adapt my mood to his directive? Is it possible? Is it logical? I can understand being commanded for an action, a deed, such as taking a lulav, sitting in a sukkah. But how can I be truly happy if it is only because I am bound to follow God's word. And why? Why command me to be happy?

If there ever existed an era when those questions should be asked, it is our own generation. Though blessed with greater wealth and leisure than our predecessors, our age is surely not one of the happiest. Psychologists have noted that were you to ask most people today if they are happy, they would answer in the negative. If you want to get a sense of the problem, remember the next time you are in a bookstore to look at the number of volumes that have been published recently containing strategies and panaceas for reaching personal happiness.

So how can God tell me to be happy? What does zman simchatenu really mean?

Permit me to retranslate the word simchah. Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Fathers) 4:1 says "ezehu 'ashir hasame'ach bechelko" – "who is truly rich; the one who is sameyach with what he has." While sameyach is often translated here as happy, I think it is better translated as — satisfied; satisfied and appreciative of that satisfaction.

Sukkot (Chag Ha'astif) comes right after most of the crops in Eretz Yisrael are harvested. This was especially significant in biblical Israel which was an agrarian society. Some years brought in a full harvest and others were lean years. Depending on the success of the harvest, the farmer no doubt exhibited one of two feelings. He either became smug with his agricultural accomplishment or frustrated by his lack of sufficient crops. In either case, his response was such that he ignored or forgot God and His Divine role in man's livelihood.

Enter now Sukkot in which we are commanded to be satisfied with what we have. Perhaps I may not feel happy, but the command is to be satisfied with what I have on this yom tov. We leave our comfortable homes and go into temporary dwellings, the sukkot, to appreciate that what we do possess and own, comes from God, and therefore, to be satisfied with our lot. The truly rich and happy person is the individual who celebrates what he has and needs not look further for life's meaning.

May we all find fulfilment in simchah shel mitzvah, in bringing God's word into our lives.

Some lessons for Sukkot

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"In sukkot you shall dwell, seven days…That your generations may know that in booths I made the children of Israel dwell when I brought them out of the land of Egypt." (Leviticus 23:42) [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/leviticu/torah/23412343.htm].

With that we are commanded to perform one of the most joyous mitzvot in the Jewish calendar. Today, some sukkah lessons from the Jewish Highway.

Build It: Whether you decide to start from scratch or want to buy a prefab Sukkah, there's something for you on the World Wide Web [http://judaism.tqn.com/msub101.htm]. Take a look at Ten Tips for Your Sukkah [http://www.jer1.co.il/city_services/holidays/sukkot-8Atzeret/]. While you're there, check out the article explaining the hows and whys of building a sukkah. Dovid Gross gives you an illustrated tour of some of the sukkot of Jerusalem and finishes off by welcoming you into his own.

Need more detail? The Mishnah explains that a sukkah built on top of a wagon or on the deck of a ship may be used on the holiday. A sukkah built on a treetop or the back of a camel may not be used. [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/tishri/elepsuka.htm]. If camels aren't a concern, Aba Ward of New Rochelle, N.Y., has provided detailed plans including diagrams for a more conventional sukkah [http://www.uscj.org/scripts/uscj/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=257]. You can also listen to some directions at 613.org [http://www.613.org/roshyomkippursuccot.html#s].

Entertain in it: If you build it they will come. Who? In addition to your earthly guests, tradition holds that every sukkah is graced each night by a different tzaddik: Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Aaron and King David. Virtual Jerusalem has a very good page explaining the spiritual significance of Ushpizin [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/sukkot-8Atzeret/ushpiz.htm].

Eat in It: Sure there's always room for gefilte fish. If you want to broaden your holiday palate, take a look at Succulence for Sukkot [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=1101]. You can try out kalia (Georgian beef soup with pomegranate), djadja bi looz (Moroccan chicken fricassee with almonds), fasoulia (Turkish braised green beans in tomatoes) and the always reliable mehren kugel (Ashkenazi carrot kugel).

If you're hungry for more, see the Jewish-Food Sukkoth Archives [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/sukindex.htm] and a Kids' Sukkah Theme Dinner [http://jewishfamily.com/Holidays/sukkah4.htm].

Learn from it: In When a House is Not Your Home, Rabbi Mendel Weinbach suggests that no matter how beautifully we decorate a sukkah, there's no mistaking that it's a temporary structure. From that we can learn about the transience of life [http://www.jer1.co.il/education/education/ohr/special/sukkos/].

Rabbi Weinbach tells the story of a traveller who once visited the Chafetz Chaim. "Where is your furniture? " asked the astonished visitor of the sage when he saw how barely furnished the room was. "And where is yours?" was the Chafetz Chaim's response. "I have no furniture with me because I am only passing through," explained the visitor. "I, too, am only passing through this world," said the Chafetz Chaim, "for our lives here are only a preparation for the real world, the World to Come. For merely passing through this corridor of time I have enough furniture."

Have a very happy holiday!

Humility and balance

Exploring the sukkah, lulav, etrog

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

With the holiday of Sukkot upon us, many modern Jews begin to wonder about the ancient symbols involved. The historical association of dwelling in booths, just as the Israelites dwelled in booths in the desert, is the reason usually offered for the building of sukkot.

But why is it important for us to live as they did? They were nomads, wanderers for 40 years. Perhaps we should spend the entire holiday of Sukkot travelling, so that we can truly live as they did. Why do we want to mirror ancient Israel's living conditions? What is the significance?

Furthermore, taking a lulav and an etrog into our hands and making special blessings upon them seems equally irrelevant. Someone once asked me why Jews walk around with a lemon and a bush during Sukkot.

We are no longer an agricultural nation; so why do we continue to carry seemingly irrelevant agricultural symbols? Although it seems that the acts of dwelling in booths and blessing the lulav and etrog are meaningless, one need not look far for their significance.

Once a year, the Torah instructs us, we are to construct a dwelling whose main defining feature is that it not be permanent. In fact, one should leave one's permanent dwelling as often as possible to spend time in this flimsy structure. Why such an odd request? The rabbis in the Mishnah have stated that you must never begin to judge another person until you have arrived in their place. For one week a year, we arrive in the place of the homeless. For one week, we scratch the surface of what life must be for those whose home is never permanent.

We have been forced into this position by Divine decree – circumstances beyond our control. Each of us encounters homeless individuals on the streets of our cities. We are quick to judge them as responsible for their circumstances. Surely they are lazy or guilty of substance abuse.

Perhaps dwelling in a sukkah will remind us that they may have arrived on the streets through circumstances beyond their control. If we are lucky, the booths will give us perspective.

Blessing the lulav and the etrog will also teach us much beyond agricultural cycles. The midrash states that the etrog symbolizes Abraham, the palm branches symbolize Isaac, the 'boughs of thick trees" symbolize Jacob and the willows symbolize Joseph. One is not surprised to see the patriarchs embodied within such an important ritual.

However, the same midrash continues to say that the etrog equally symbolizes Sarah, the palm branches symbolize Rebecca, the "boughs of thick trees" symbolize Leah and the willows symbolize Rachel. The lulav and the etrog stand for many things, and among them are both our patriarchs and our matriarchs.

If we view Sukkot as a historical, agricultural remnant of our past, the symbols become obsolete and are easily dismissed. If we are lucky enough to experience the holiday, and not just commemorate it, we learn humility and balance.

Sukkot

The spinning globe, renewed a booth bedecked with flowers, torrential prayers overhead,
the sun's breath sweet and strong.

The palm, myrtle and willow sway with winds of tomorrow, and the moon, velvet ivory blesses the tranquil harvesters.

And the people,
white, red, black and yellow,
accept their common mortality, and each, in his own sukkah,
repeats the Universal Shemah.

Israeli women's stories tug at heart-strings

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Agency for Israel representatives Genia Gitkis and Rachel Korazim tell compelling stories of their respective lives, and the effect the agency had on them.

The two women were in Toronto recently to address a group of 120 women at a UJA Lion of Judah luncheon.

"Your [UJA] support helped me find my lost identity," said Gitkis, a 23-year-old native of Ukraine who made aliyah in 1994.

Gitkis was raised in "a typical communist family completely cut off from Jewish tradition." Her grandparents, however, spoke Yiddish if they didn't want her to understand.

The only Jew at her school in Vinnitsa, a small town five hours from Kiev, Gitkis wanted no connection with Judaism. A community seder she attended at the age of 14 only alienated her further.

"I felt out of place. I didn't understand what they were doing...it strengthened my desire to feel more connected to the Ukrainian people that surrounded me," she said.

Gitkis' life took an unanticipated turn two years later, when the time came for her to get her passport. Although she wanted to be identified only as a Ukrainian, her passport identified her as a Jew.

And although she dreamed of studying English at university, it would have entailed a bribe her mother couldn't afford, she said.

It was "easy" to be accepted into Jewish studies at Kiev's State Pedagogical Institute, and she hoped in time she would be able to transfer to the English faculty.

She resisted taking part in Jewish activities until a persistent Jewish Agency shaliach started inviting her to meetings and events like Kabbalat Shabbat.

"I'm sure you'll be a Zionist and make aliyah," he told Gitkis on meeting her.

"What chutzpah!" she thought.

At a leadership seminar, the petite, feisty student was chosen to teach Jews in their early twenties about Jewish identity. She was only 17. "I guess they saw something in me."

Her attitude changed. Three months after she began studying Hebrew, she was teaching the language to others, and she wanted to know more.

"I still didn't feel Jewish," she recalled, but her first visit to Israel, at the invitation of the Jewish Agency in 1992, changed that. "It felt good. It felt [like] home."

Gitkis began teaching her mother, and at her daughter's urging the mother left her teaching job to become the aliyah co-ordinator in the Ukraine.

Rachel Korazim

Genia Gitkis

Two years later Gitkis made aliyah. She now works for the Jewish Agency and is studying for a master's degree in educational counselling at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

She has returned to the former Soviet Union as a shlichah at Jewish winter and summer camps, and represented the Zionist Woman of the '90s at a recent congress on Women and Zionism, held in Israel.

Unlike Gitkis, Korazim is a sabra whose connection to the Jewish Agency predates her birth. She heads its division for professional development and in-service training in the department for Jewish education and culture in the Diaspora, and spent four years as a shlichah in Montreal in the 1980s.

In 1946, Korazim's grandmother, a frail but determined Holocaust survivor, insisted the family make aliyah, despite her non-Zionist background. Her two daughters (Korazim's mother and aunt) had nursed her back to health after she made her way home to Budapest's Orthodox ghetto.

The sisters had been spared by the Nazis because they could sew, Korazim said. The older sister (Korazim's mother) married at the beginning of 1946.

On their arrival in Haifa, the small family of four was taken to the illegal immigrants' detention camp at Athlit. Their welcome, which Korazim's mother remembers gratefully, consisted of "Jewish Agency people on the road throwing oranges into the truck."

Korazim was born that October, and against conventional wisdom of the time – which advocated that new immigrants become Israeli as quickly as possible – she was taught Hungarian so she could communicate with her grandmother.

Her language skills proved important in 1990 when the Jewish community in Budapest decided to establish a Jewish day school.

Korazim was sent to Hungary, and has returned regularly to help them. On her first visit, even the school principal didn't know what Korazim meant when she said, "Shabbat Shalom." She quickly taught them "Shabbat 101."

She has returned annually and reports that the school now has over 600 children, who have learned together with their teachers.

MKs slam Reform, Conservative movements

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Israeli parliamentarians have accused the Reform and Conservative movements of blowing the divisive conversion issue out of all proportion.

Zvi (Henry) Weinberg of Yisrael Ba'aliyah and Rabbi Nissim Dahan of Shas levelled the charge at an informal meeting with Jewish students at the University of Toronto on the eve of Rosh Hashanah.

Weinberg, a former U of T French professor who made aliyah in 1992, said that Reform and Conservative Jews had erred by taking their case to Israel's Supreme Court.

By doing so, he noted, they have "thrown a bomb at Israeli society" and let "a very dangerous genie" out of the bottle.

His colleague, Rabbi Dahan, said that some Reform and Conservative Jews have a vested interest in magnifying the issue.

The Reform and Conservative movements oppose a pending conversion bill which received first reading in the Knesset last year. The legislation, if passed, would formally codify into law the Orthodox monopoly over conversions performed in Israel.

Orthodox parties in Israel have urged Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to push it through parliament.

Three months ago, he told his coalition partners that his government is committed to the legislation.

The parties in Netanyahu's coalition include Yisrael Ba'aliyah, a centrist party led by former Soviet dissident Natan Sharansky which largely represents new Russian immigrants, and Shas, an ultra-Orthodox party whose constituents are mainly Jews of Moroccan origin.

In an attempt to solve the problem, Netanyahu created a committee chaired by Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman. In January 1997, Ne'eman submitted a report in which he proposed a compromise solution.

The chief rabbinate rejected the centrepiece of the compromise, a joint institute sponsored by the Jewish Agency which would prepare potential converts for conversion.

Weinberg, an observant Jew and the second Canadian member of the Knesset after the late Dov Joseph, acknowledged that Reform and Conservative Jews have legitimate grievances.

But he pointed out that they can practice their faith freely in Israel, and claimed their case against the Orthodox rabbinate really rests on a handful of non-Jews who want to be converted to Judaism by Reform rabbis.

"The issue has been blown out of all proportion," he declared.

Weinberg said the Reform and Conservative movements have violated the religious status quo in Israel, since the chief rabbinate historically has been the only body authorized to perform conversions.

Lashing out at the Israeli political left, Weinberg said it has used the controversy over conversions "to knock the government for ruining relations with the Diaspora."

Calling the accusation untrue, he said Netanyahu was getting a "bum rap" from these critics. In a reference to Netanyahu's fractious coalition, Weinberg said that if the prime minister offends his ultra-Orthodox allies, the government could be toppled.

Describing all Jews as "brothers," regardless of their religious affiliations, Rabbi Dahan suggested that if sufficient numbers of Reform Jews immigrate to Israel, they can form a political party and lobby for their rights.

Turning to the Oslo peace process, Weinberg said he wishes Netanyahu could move "faster and more decisively" in reaching an agreement with the Palestinians over a 13 percent redeployment from the West Bank.

Netanyahu, however, is "personally committed to the process," he observed.

Weinberg disclosed that the government is approaching a final decision with respect to further withdrawals.

"We expect a decision, one way or another, by Oct. 19, when the Knesset reconvenes."

If the government does not make up its mind by then, he predicted, new elections will probably be called.

Commenting on Israel's current negotiations with the Palestinians, Rabbi Dahan said that territory won in war is not normally relinquished by the victor.

But Israel, he said, cannot withstand international pressure to give up land it acquired in the Six Day War.

And a substantial percentage of Israelis believe in the land-for-peace formula, he said.

Israel, though, has genuine security needs, and must convince the world of its views, Rabbi Dahan stated.

CJC seeks names of survivors in mental hospitals

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel should give the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) the names of Holocaust survivors in Israeli mental hospitals so that Congress can help relatives find loved ones, CJC president Moshe Ronen says.

Up to now, Israel has refused to release the survivors' names to individuals making inquiries, citing medical confidentiality.

"We're willing to hear the objections the Israelis have to making the names public, but if necessary, we'll receive the names in confidence so we can answer inquiries from relatives," said Ronen.

Gustava Weiner of Montreal, who brought the issue to the CJC's attention nearly three years ago, said Congress is a legitimate recipient of the names, and Ronen's offer is in line with a proposal she made to the CJC at that time.

Her requests for names, made to the Israeli Ministry of Health over the past three years, were denied because of confidentiality.

In August, the Israeli newspaper Ma'ariv reported that 900 to 960 Holocaust survivors are still in mental hospitals. In 1952, Israel accepted 1,000 survivors classified as mentally ill from West Germany.

In response to the Ma'ariv story, Israel set up a special commission to investigate complaints that the patients are not being well cared for and have been denied restitution payments owed to them by Germany.

Ronen is to meet Israeli Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi in Toronto at the end of October regarding the survivors. CJC is seeking to make a formal submission to the investigating commission.

In preparation, Ronen said CJC officials want to question psychiatrists who have spoken out and also bureaucrats who administer the system.

Orthodox conversion only acceptable process: rabbi

By REVA KAISER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Conversion Authority, a division of Israel's Chief Rabbinate, was founded three years ago in order to deal with the overwhelming number of immigrants seeking an Orthodox conversion, says the division's director.

Speaking recently at a lecture sponsored by Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz Congregation, Rabbi Raphael Ostroff said that the Orthodox conversion is the only process accepted by all branches of Judaism – and the reason why many Russians are choosing it specifically.

Most immigrants who seek conversions are Russians, Rabbi Ostroff said, although the majority of Russians are not seeking conversion. Many were assimilated, but believe in their Jewish identity, even though they are not technically Jewish, he said.

To ensure that those who wish to convert are doing so sincerely, and to deal with their multiplying numbers, said Rabbi Ostroff, the rabbinate established the conversion sector. "If they are serious about Judaism," he said, "the system is user-friendly; it is possible to convert."

'The entire process is very educational and emotional'

There are two parts to the conversion process, Rabbi Ostroff explained. The first is the ulpan where students are taught the basics of Judaism, with an emphasis on Jewish history and law. Stressed throughout the course are the laws of kashrut, Shabbat and taharat hamishpachah (family purity). Men are also encouraged to pray at least twice a day.

Since the majority of students are female, one requirement of the ulpan is that Jewish husbands must attend as well. Many classes are taught in Russian, and the course lasts a full year.

After successfully completing the ulpan, the converts proceed to the second part of the conversion process, the beit din, the rabbinical court dealing exclusively with conversions. Once the beit din approves the convert, a bath in the mikvah is required, and males are circumcised. Converts receive two documents: an official conversion document from the Chief Rabbinate, and a document from the Religion Ministry authorizing the convert's identity card to be changed to "Jew."

"The entire process is very educational and emotional," Rabbi Ostroff said, "and the majority of those who finish the ulpan are successfully converted." There is, however, a 20 to 30 percent dropout rate from the ulpan.

There are no follow-up studies to see how many converts keep the laws they were taught during the ulpan. Once they are Jews, said Rabbi Ostroff, and have fully accepted the Jewish faith, it is all between them and God.

GOOD SERVANT MEDAL

Carrie and Adam's hope is alive and doing well for the Hospital for Sick Children.

When Hilary Prusznowski lost her child to cancer, and her friend Brenda lost her child to Riley-Day syndrome they wanted to keep their kids' hope alive – that other kids wouldn't have to go through such pain and suffering.

For the past two years, Hilary and Brenda have hosted an annual fund raising dinner and auction. The Carrie & Adam Dream Fund Dinner and Silent Auction has raised over $200,000 for two programs at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto: Paediatric Oncology (cancer) Research and the Therapeutic Clown Program. The latter, only the second of its kind in Canada, involves clowns and helps children deal with the loneliness and fear of staying in the hospital.

As one co-volunteer tells it, "Hilary is so passionate and dynamic in speaking about her vision, it's hard not to get involved."

Hilary works for Royal Bank in Metro Toronto. She's just one of many Royal Bank staff across Canada who take time out to help in their communities. And we'd just like to take this opportunity to thank them for doing what they do.

Women's Campaign Steps Up Support

UJA Federation's Women's Campaign contributions are up considerably this year - mirroring strong overall campaign gift increases. A majority of leading women donors who have already made their Campaign for Fifty gifts are averaging pledges that are 25% higher than last year.

Women's Campaign Chair Judy Engel thanked participants at the Lion of Judah Luncheon, honouring donors contributing a minimum of $5,000 and up, for their leadership in working toward the Campaign for Fifty goal of $50 million by 2001.

"I feel that all of us share this sense of collective responsibility in helping our community take this important leap forward," said Engel. Last year 250 Lion of Judah contributors raised $2.2 million bringing the annual Women's Campaign total to $4 million.

"Thank you for understanding the urgency driving the Campaign for Fifty and for responding with immediacy to calls for increased support," added Engel. The Lion of Judah, according to Engel, has long symbolized courage, strength and commitment to our Jewish community, and is recognized worldwide.

Honey Sherman, Chair of the Lion of Judah Endowment program part of UJA Federation's Legacy Campaign, urged participants to join nearly 1,000 other North American women who have made Lion of Judah Endowments. An Endowment gift of $100,000 that would generate $5,000 annually, allows women to endow their annual campaign contribution so that it will continue in perpetuity, helping Jews in need for years to come.

Voices From the Heart

Tuxedos in the Ma'abara!

The following is an edited excerpt, the third in a series, from Voices from the Heart: A Community Celebrates 50 Years of Israel, edited by Bonnie Goldstein and Jaclyn Shulman, published by McClelland & Stewart Inc. The book, a collection of personal reflections by Canadians about their experiences in Israel, was produced as part of Toronto's Israel at 50 celebrations. This unique 395-page volume is available by calling UJA Federation at (416) 631-5685.

By Kurt E. Weinberg

It was September 1952 and Israel was just over four years old. From everywhere, and especially from the liberated camps of Europe, hundreds of thousands of homeless refugees streamed to the new nation. Almost all of them came with only the clothes on their backs, depending on others for housing, food and dress. Toronto industrialist and ardent Zionist Louis L. Lockshin conducted a city-wide campaign for used clothes, known as "Materials for Israel," over a six-month period. I was engaged by the Zionist Organization of Canada to help the drive reach success.

Our headquarters was the Toronto Zionist Centre at 651 Spadina Avenue, now demolished. We launched a massive advertising blitz in the newspapers and on the radio, calling on the community to open their wardrobes and empty them of everything that could be spared. Soon the phones were ringing off the hook with offers of all kinds of wear, from furs to jeans. Nothing was refused.

Clothing tumbled in by the ton and was stacked from the floor to the ceiling. After a couple of months, we were close to exhaustion from the effort, but we formed many close friendships in the excitement of the moment.

Messages soon arrived from Jerusalem, gratefully acknowledging receipt of the shipments and urging us to do even more, since there were still thousands of olim (immigrants) waiting for a suit, jacket or dress. We approached local manufacturers for their current stock and discontinued lines from previous seasons. Those who had nothing to contribute were enrolled as route drivers. And so it went on, for six glorious months, until finally word came that we had sent enough and could end the campaign. Toronto had clothed a large part of Israel's new population.

The quality of the goods we received was good, and most of the clothing contributed was clean and appropriate. But once in a while, from the more affluent sections of the community, we received tuxedos, frock coats, and evening gowns! We shipped these anyway, with a whimsical smile, imagining how they would look on an immigrant in a government-established ma'abara (temporary camp for new immigrants) in the middle of nowhere.

Facing Squalor in Moscow

By Howard Lichtman

Recently, Howard Lichtman, the Chair of UJA Federation's Marketing Advisory Committee, visited Russia on a UJA Federation Mission to see some of the urgent needs for which contributions to the current Campaign for Fifty will be allocated. This is the last part of his series.

Throughout the former Soviet Union, the Joint Distribution Committee, supported, in part, by UJA Federation donations, operates 63 chesed centres, helping 120,000 Jewish elderly in 651 cities and towns. The recipients of this life-saving assistance receive more than 884,000 meals in 162 communal dining rooms. The Joint also delivers over 600,000 meals on wheels and makes more than 900,000 home care visits.

All of these are overwhelming statistics but nothing is as powerful as putting a face to the numbers.

The Moscow woman we visited was 92 years old, with a monthly pension of $25 (U.S.) and rent of $30. She shares an apartment with a non-Jewish police officer, his wife and daughter. The woman told us, through a translator, that the officer wasn't all that bad, but that neither the wife nor the daughter would pick her up off the floor if she fell.

It is impossible to articulate the squalor in which she was living. She is not strong enough to leave the house. She has no other family and once a week, we deliver food to her, which will last for only 7 days. She cried in appreciation of the food and begged for medical aid. Unlike Canada, there is no free access to drugs for her pain.

Through the JDC, we also distributed more than 12,000 pieces of medical equipment last year, which barely meet existing needs. Imagine if you fell and needed a walker, a cane or a wheelchair and nothing was available.

We left Russia with both a shared sense of despair and a shared sense of pride for the work we are doing, knowing that it is our obligation to help Jews in need wherever in the world they are located.

Web Sites Wanted

Hundreds of Jewish organizations in Toronto will soon be connected through cyberspace thanks to UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto web site.

For nearly two years, Jewish Toronto (www.feduja.org) has been serving as a central resource for Toronto's diverse Jewish community, providing information about community services and agencies. Now a new pilot project is taking Jewish Toronto to the next phase by making it easier for qualifying community groups to build and link their own sub sites hosted by Jewish Toronto.

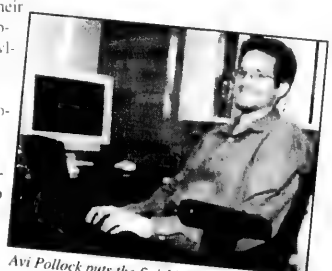
Software called Site Manager, created by North American Media Engines for Jewish Toronto offers a user-friendly way for participating organizations to design and manage their own sub-sites.

"We're providing the tools to allow people to create their own Jewish Toronto sub-sites with minimal knowledge," explains project manager Avi Pollock. "Now, with this new program, when someone is uploading their site information, it automatically gets formatted into a Jewish Toronto template."

Ten organizations, including the Bathurst Jewish Centre and UJA Federation's Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre are already participating in the pilot project. Art Benjamin, Chair of the Jewish Toronto Steering Committee, says the Site Manager will give organizations the ability to reach thousands of visitors. "The goal is to help every Jewish individual, group and organization in Toronto take part in our wired community," says Benjamin.

According to Benjamin, schools, synagogues and organizations joining the Jewish Toronto project can both enhance their profile and use the Internet as a vehicle for communication with students, parents and members.

If you would like to find out more about the Jewish Toronto Site Manager Project call Joel Verbin at (416) 635-5600.



Avi Pollock puts the finishing touches on the Site Manager Software at his North American Media Engines Office.

A Capital Tour

If you're looking for the inside track on current Canadian issues, then you'll want to grab a seat on UJA Federation's 1999 Ottawa Fly-In departing next month.

The agenda-for the one day whirlwind visit to the nation's capital, Thursday, October 29, is packed with top level briefings by national leaders and dignitaries such as NDP leader Alexa McDonough, Bloc Qebecois leader Gilles Duceppe and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs Stephane Dion. Former Liberal MP Barry Campbell will escort participants throughout the day, which will include lunch with Toronto area members of the Liberal caucus.

The mission, which costs $450 per person, will also bring participants face-to-face with Liberal MPs in the House of Commons during the afternoon Question Period and a private reception with Secretary of State Jim Peterson. Other highlights include briefing on the Israeli-Arab peace process.

"This is a great way to gain an understanding of the impact of national policies on our Jewish community and our beneficiary agencies," notes Rick Orzy, who is co-chairing this year's Ottawa Fly-In with Jill Reitman.

To reserve a seat or for more information, call Cindy at (416) 635-2883 ext. 190.

CJC blasts Amnesty Int'l report

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has fought back against a report by Amnesty International (AI) that blasts Israel for its alleged human rights abuses.

It's the first time in memory that Congress has responded to a report from AI, which issues routine denunciations of human rights conditions in Israel and Palestinian-controlled areas.

CJC pulls no punches, saying the AI report makes "blatant omissions" and calling it "convoluted," and "skewed."

AI's 40-page report alleges that more than 10,000 Palestinians have been arrested by Israeli security forces and are "routinely" tortured under interrogation.

Among its other claims are that:
• Human rights have been "consistently" sacrificed by Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) in the name of "security";
• Israel's supreme court "accepted and legitimized" the use of torture and administrative detention without trial;
• Allowing Israeli security to kill suspected terrorists anywhere in the world has been endorsed by a commission of inquiry;
• Suicide bombings, which have caused the deaths of over 100 Israeli civilians "have provided the pretext for many" of Israel's human rights violations.

The report is also critical of the PA, saying that the Palestinian judiciary has become "marginalized," and hundreds of Palestinians have been subjected to unfair trials and torture, including 200 who remain detained without charge or trial.

In a letter to AI secretary general Roger Clark, CJC Israel affairs chair Harold Brief and co-chair Simon Rosenblum say Amnesty's report disproportionately focuses on Israel.

CJC blasts AI's use of quotation marks around words like security and terror, saying both are real concerns to Israelis.

Congress adds it is "shocked and dismayed" that the report makes the "convoluted" assertion that killings of Palestinians by Israelis have led to suicide bombings in Israel.

CJC finds it "objectionable" that AI doesn't condemn the PA's sanctioning of an atmosphere of terror for Israelis, and adds that it's "a twist of the truth" to suggest that Israel's supreme court has legitimized torture.

Brief told The CJN that from now on, Congress will "take a much more aggressive approach" to AI.

Oslo marked by success, failure says Peace Now

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The five-year-old Oslo accords are a mixed bag of accomplishments and failures, says the political director of Americans for Peace Now, Mark Rosenblum.

On the positive side, Oslo enabled Israel to receive $10 billion in loan guarantees from the United States to prepare itself for the absorption of hundreds of thousands of Soviet immigrants, Rosenblum said in a recent speech to Canadian Friends of Peace Now.

And thanks to Oslo, Jordan signed a peace treaty with Israel, Syria let Jews emigrate en masse, foreign investors poured unprecedented sums of capital into Israel, and Israel normalized relations with several Arab countries in North Africa, he said.

At the same time, Rosenblum added, Israel has been hit by a wave of Palestinian terrorism, Hamas and Islamic Jihad have grown stronger, Palestine Authority President Yasser Arafat has become correspondingly weaker, and economic conditions in the Gaza Strip, a breeding ground of Islamic fundamentalism, have deteriorated.

Oslo's achievements, he declared, are threatened by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's hard-line policies and delays in implementing a redeployment in the West Bank.

Netanyahu has made an art form out of stalling, Rosenblum said, but he is a tactically brilliant politician. "To underestimate him is to make a terrible mistake."

Yet Arafat has not been a completely reliable partner in peace, especially when it comes to dealing with terrorism, Rosenblum said.

"Arafat's hands are not clean," he said, claiming Arafat turned a blind eye to at least one Hamas suicide bombing during a wave of terrorism in Israel in the winter of 1996.

Oslo has one great structural flaw, according to Rosenblum: It does not provide for third party adjudication in disputes between Israel and the Palestinians. But of late, he noted, the United States has attempted to play that role.

Rosenblum predicted that if Netanyahu carries out American bridging proposals for a 13 percent Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank, the prime minister will try to mollify the far right either by completing the Har Homa housing project or by building in Ras al-Amud, which are both in eastern Jerusalem.

Rosenblum speculated that Arafat may hold up an agreement so as to deprive Netanyahu of both a diplomatic victory and the possibility of defeating Labor party leader Ehud Barak in the next general election.

Barak, Rosenblum said, has proved to be anything but a dramatic and dynamic politician.

Arafat's threat to unilaterally declare a Palestinian state next year may be to Netanyahu's advantage, he said.

Once the Palestinians declare statehood, Rosenblum noted, Netanyahu could annex Area C, which comprises 73 percent of the West Bank. Area C is currently under full Israeli control and contains very few Palestinians.

With an annexation, Netanyahu could claim he had achieved maximum separation from the Palestinians with minimum territorial concessions, Rosenblum said.

Rosenblum took issue with the Israeli government's contention that its policy of expanding settlements beyond the Green Line is dictated by the natural growth of the Jewish population.

Citing a figure from Settlement Watch, a Peace Now agency, he disclosed that the vacancy rate in settlements in the territories now stands at 12 percent. He described the settlements as "ticking time-bombs."

Peace Now in Israel is working hard to expand membership by reaching out to Russian and Sephardi Jews, Rosenblum disclosed.

Jewish student leaders attend first COSL

By ELISE LEVINOFF
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Forty Jewish student leaders attended the first ever Conference of Ontario Student Leaders (COSL), which recently took place at the Wildfire Outdoor Education Centre near Barrie, Ontario.

COSL, organized by Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) in partnership with Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC), provided student leaders with an opportunity to meet and share ideas for the 1998-99 academic year and to discuss campus programming with their peers and with field workers from CJC and Jewish Campus Services.

In a session entitled Israel is 50, Learn the History, Michael Soberman, CJC's director of community services and youth activities, spoke about current challenges and conflicts in Israel. He said he feels it is important for students who have been to Israel to speak about their experiences there.

Soberman also led a session on stereotypes and stigmas often attached to Jewish student groups on campus. He challenged the students to promote their respective organizations in a positive way, and to reach out to uninvolved students.

"COSL stirred up enthusiasm among the students," said Jeremy Lichtman, a York University student. "Hopefully it will result in good programming on campuses."

Jordie Caplan, the Jewish Campus Service Corps Fellow at York University, felt that COSL "opened me up to new ideas in Jewish programming on campus."

McMaster student Hindy Wasserman said the conference helped her realize that "most Jewish student organizations are really the same and have much the same problems, and we could benefit by discussing our progress with each other."

"A conference such as this is ideal for the small campuses," said Monika Roseman, co-president of the McMaster Jewish Students Association. "It gives us an idea of what is going on in the rest of the province [and provides] programming ideas and solutions to problems already dealt with by other schools. In a small community, you tend to feel somewhat detached from the rest of the Jewish community. Conferences such as this make you realize that you are still one of the family."

At a session with Michael Sobol, national co-chair of CJC's small communities committee and a professor at the University of Guelph, students addressed the issue of small Jewish student populations on campuses outside of Toronto. Students voiced their opinions about the challenges of living in small Jewish communities and said they need support from the larger ones.

COSL was an opening meeting for most campuses, and a great way to re-orient students and get them thinking about the upcoming year.

Delegates represented York University, the University of Toronto, Ryerson Polytechnic University, McMaster University, the University of Western Ontario, Queen's University, the University of Waterloo and Wilfrid Laurier University (which have a combined Jewish Students' Association), Carleton University and the University of Windsor. Also in attendance was Kol Hastudentim, an organization of Jewish student leaders from campuses across Ontario.

Jewish Campus Services is an organization committed to fostering Jewish life on Toronto university and college campuses. It is now in its fourth year of operation, with Hillel offices at York, Ryerson, U of T and Seneca College.

Canadian Jewish Congress provides similar services to campuses outside of the Greater Toronto Area through its Community Services and Youth Activities department. The services include Jewish programming, community relations and resource materials.

Super Sunday pledges up

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — More people than ever volunteered on this year's Super Sunday, and pledges were up 16 percent, says the executive director of Winnipeg's Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA).

"Super Sunday was really super," says Gerry Koffman.

Of particular significance this year, says Koffman, is that the United Israel Appeal (UIA) message seems to be getting through.

Winnipeg has a two-line card, he says, that allows donors to choose how much money they want to donate towards local needs and how much for overseas projects.

Last year, a much higher percentage of donations were designated for the local community. This year, however, donors designated more money for Israel and overseas concerns.

"We have been able to make people aware that 65 percent of UIA money goes toward the rescue and resettlement of Jews from the former Soviet Union," Koffman says. "As well, 150,000 poor and elderly Jews still in the former Soviet Union are dependent on UJA/UIA dollars."

Last year, the CJA campaign in Winnipeg raised just over $3 million. Koffman would like to see a 10 percent increase for this year.

Folk ensemble gets $50,000 grant

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble has received a $50,000 grant which will go towards paying the cost of the group's first tour of Israel Nov. 9 to 18.

The grant was given by the International Cultural Relations program which promotes Canadian values and interests abroad by showcasing Canadian culture.

The 35-year-old group, named for its late founder Sarah Sommer, is well known in Winnipeg's Jewish community, and has performed throughout North America.

"We are real excited about our trip to Israel," says Lorne Weiss, president of Chai's board of directors. "We have always dreamed about performing our songs and dances in Israel. Some of our performers have taken a year off school to be able to participate. In some cases, there will parents and grand- parents going as well."

The cost of the trip, including airfare and ground costs,will be about $125,000, Weiss says.

The troupe has three shows scheduled: one in Gan Yavne, the Winnipeg Jewish community's twin city in Israel; a second at Kiryat Shemona; and one at the General Assembly of North American Jewish Federations, which is meeting in Jerusalem as part of Mission to Mishpocha.

New JCC opens in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A chain of 80 people passed a mezuzah from hand to hand in a relay from the old JCC to the new Soloway Jewish Community Centre in the Ages Family Building to mark the recent opening of the new facility.

Participants in the Dor l'Dor (generation to generation) relay, which symbolized the move from old to new, represented various community organizations.

The brand new, state-of-the-art 65,000-square-foot building includes a fitness centre, a gym, an aerobics studio, a swimming pool, meeting rooms, a library, a preschool, a teen lounge in the Soloway JCC, and offices for several community organizations.

The building will be the hub of the Jewish Community Campus, a complex of buildings serving the Jewish community that will be the fulfilment of a dream of many years. Already on the campus is a community school building that is home to a Hebrew day school, two afternoon schools and an afternoon high school, and the Tamir Foundation residence for developmentally handicapped adults is nearby. Now that government approval to build has been received, the campus will soon include Hillel Lodge, the community home for the Jewish aged.

For the opening of the centre, a huge tent was set up on the grounds, with a food court featuring local kosher caterers around the perimeter. Children's activities, musical entertainment and a festive atmosphere prevailed as people waited for the doors to open.

Barbara Farber, president of the Jewish Community Council/Vaad Ha'Ir, said it was "a perfect day, and the [beautiful] weather mirrors the image that we all have today" of the new facility.

JCC president Jeff Gould thanked the people who had worked to bring the project to fruition.

"The Soloway JCC will be our community's village square, " Gould said. "The only ingredient needed to clearly turn our dream into reality is you…If you are Jewish and living in this city, the Soloway JCC is the place to be."

Hy Soloway, a former president of the Ottawa Vaad Ha'Ir, the JCC and Congregation Beth Shalom and for whose family the JCC is named, cut the ribbon, officially opening the building. Accompanying him were Roger Greenberg, Stephen Greenberg, Jeff Gould, Mitchell Bellman, Linda Kerzner, Stephen Victor and Dr. Bernard Dolansky.

Attending the event were local politicians, Israeli Embassy officials and members of the clergy.

Following the ribbon-cutting, a large challah was cut, the shofar was blown and the doors were opened.

Crowds of people streamed through the building for a "self-guided tour." Following blue arrows on the floor, they found their way from room to room and were able to finally see what will now become, according to Gould, their "home away from home."

Two mentsches together

In their speeches to each other, they compared the Jewish and Xhosa (Mandela's tribe) rites of passage into manhood. Both spoke from the heart. "Tonight you have proven to me that dreams can come true," said Craig. "You have proven that many times over, to many people in South Africa and around the world. Your presence here is further proof that you are not only a great leader but a kind and caring person."

When Mandela left 40 minutes later, noting apologetically that he had important state functions to attend, and holding the denim kippah that Craig had given him as a gift, the party got back to normal – giggly kids doing the Macarena, weepy relatives toasting a teenager's future – and rightly so. After all, the night belonged to Craig.

Why did the president come to the bar mitzvah? Maybe he was trying to score some points with the Jewish community (in his speech, Mandela mentioned how the only law firm to accept him at the beginning of his career was a Jewish one). But maybe he just wanted to get to know a gutsy kid whose generation is the future of South Africa.

All I know is, now on my coffee table, next to Mandela's biography Long Walk to Freedom, sits a photograph of two mentsches dressed in black and white, an old man and a young man, smiling and shaking hands.

• an enhanced Loyalty Program for frequent flyers. Up to March 15, 1999, couples who fly to Israel will receive 600 points per person, 200 more than is regularly offered. One return flight will generate 1,200 points per couple, half the 2,400 points needed for one free return ticket. El Al is hoping to attract 1,000 new members to its Loyalty Program by mid-March.

El Al is offering these new programs "to be closer to the community, to show we are the airline of the community," Shamai said.

The recent summer season of Canada-Israel flights has proven a success, Shamai said. In addition, "we had good traffic from Israel to Canada.

"We are on the right track. We are listening to the needs of the community, what you expect from us service-wise, operations-wise. And we are investing in this market by bringing in the 767. We have a niche today, and we expect to expand our niche." The airline hopes to attract "those who left us in the last two or three years," he said.

The non-stop Toronto-Israel route should also make the airline attractive to Christian visitors planning to visit the Holy Land in the year 2000, Shamai added.

Israel warns against unilateral Palestinian state

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

UNITED NATIONS — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu issued a stern warning to the world last week.

Palestinian plans to declare an independent state next May would "cause the complete collapse" of the peace process, Netanyahu said in his address to the United Nations 185-member General Assembly just after Rosh Hashanah.

Netanyahu strongly urged the Palestinian Authority "not to take this course," calling such a move "arbitrary" and "unilateral."

"It will inevitably prompt unilateral responses on our part," he warned. "This development will not be good for the Palestinians, will not be good for Israel, will not be good for world peace."

With the peace process deadlocked for more than 18 months, it appears that final-status talks will not be concluded in the next eight months.

But the Palestinians have repeatedly affirmed their intention to go ahead with a declaration in the absence of a final-status agreement.

In a 20-minute speech received with polite applause, Netanyahu returned repeatedly to the tenuous balance between Palestinian autonomy and Israeli security.

His appearance at the UN occurred just hours after a rush-hour explosion at a Jerusalem bus stop injured one soldier.

That occurrence, he said, proved that Israel's security concerns were "not hypothetical."

For enduring peace to succeed, Netanyahu said, "the Palestinians should have all the powers to govern their lives and none of the powers to threaten our lives.

"They will have control of all aspects of their society," Netanyahu insisted, "such as law, religion and education, industry, commerce and agriculture, tourism, health and welfare.

The Israeli premier stressed Israel's right to ensure that "the Palestinian entity" would not become a base for hostile or foreign forces, terrorists or weaponry.

"This is the great challenge of the permanent-status negotiations," he announced. "To achieve a durable peace that will strike a balance between Palestinian self-rule and Israel's security," which he added, could be achieved "by negotiations and negotiations alone."

Netanyahu conjured up a vision of Middle East peace in which the region's children would interact peacefully and respectfully and in which countries would cooperate in a regional market-based economy.

"The absence of violence will allow all of us – Palestinians, Jordanians and Israelis – to reach a standard of living and quality of life now considered unimaginable."

He also expressed his desire for peace with Lebanon and Syria to "complete the circle of peace with our immediate neighbors."

Taking up a theme introduced at the UN this week by other world leaders, including President Clinton, Netanyahu called terrorism "a global cancer."

He also pointed to the development of medium-range missiles by Iran, and Iraq's refusal to comply with UN weapons inspections, as dangers threatening all nations.

Netanyahu peppered his remarks with references to Jewish liturgy, tradition and history, including the Jewish people's historical ties to the land of Israel, which he said had been recognized by the organized international community with the creation of the State of Israel.

PA planning land claims

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Surveyors from east Jerusalem's Orient House have photographed and mapped over 1,000 houses in western Jerusalem, which had been inhabited by Arabs before 1948 but have been occupied by Jews for the past 50 years.

The Palestinians are preparing the material ahead of final status negotiations and are planning to demand ownership and/or compensation for these houses and for other property in western parts of Jerusalem, Israeli sources say.

The Israeli Arab surveyors visited Malha, Talbiyeh, Baka, Ein Kerem, Romema and several moshavim in the Jerusalem area. Palestinian Authority representatives also visited the National Lands Registry (Tabu) in Jerusalem and even made a formal request to the Turkish government to receive all registration papers and land deeds connected to property in Jerusalem from the days of Ottoman rule over Palestine.

Ha'aretz has also learned that the Palestinians have completed drafting a petition to the High Court of Justice demanding the return of property abandoned and seized in Jerusalem during the 1948 War of Independence.

Israeli, Iranian defence ministers trade threats

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran would be wiser not to threaten Israel, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai warned yesterday in response to statements by Iranian Defence Minister Ali Shamkhani.

Shamkhani had said Iran would fire missiles at Israel if Israel were to attack the nuclear reactor in southern Iran.

"The Iranians know our strength and our ability, and I advise them not to threaten us. We have all the necessary means to ensure the life of the state and its citizens," Mordechai said upon leaving a meeting of the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee.

However, Mordechai said he did not support Labor MK Ephraim Sneh's suggestion that Israel launch a pre-emptive strike to destroy Iran's capability of hitting Israel with nuclear weapons. "I have no intention of embarking on warlike declarations, which, in my eyes, are unnecessary and damaging," Mordechai said.

Meanwhile, Syria and Iran yesterday issued declarations of mutual support for each other against Israel. Shamkhani, in an article published in the Dubai newspaper Al-Ittihad, was quoted as saying that if Israel were to attack Syria, Iran would respond "in a manner beyond the Israelis' wildest dreams."

The official Syrian news agency SNA charged that "Israel is embarking on an anti-Iranian campaign in order to increase tension in the Middle East and divert attention from its policies, which ignore the will of the international community and all its decisions."

During the committee meeting, Mordechai said Israel is building a long-term solution to the threat of ballistic missiles from Arab countries in the form of the Arrow anti-missile missile. The Arrow, he said, will eventually provide protection against both Scuds and the Iranian missiles. However, he warned, even after the Arrow is operational, there is no way to seal the skies hermetically against attack.

Defence Ministry representatives told MKs that if everything goes according to plan, the Arrow will be partially operational only at the end of 1999. At this stage, the missile will already provide interception capabilities, but only in 2005 will it be fully operational, they said.

Development might be speeded up, Mordechai added, but only if more money is allocated to the project.

In order to save time, Mordechai said he has ordered that work on a system to operate the Arrow go forward simultaneously with the development of the missile itself.

A senior intelligence officer told the committee that Iranian development of the Shahab-3 will end next year, and the missile will become a production prototype. Despite massive pressure from the United States, he noted, the Russians have not stopped their assistance to the project.

Also in 1999, the officer said, the Iranians will begin development of the Shahab-4 – again with Russian assistance. This missile is to have a range of 2,500 kilometres, and the Iranians are also planning a Shahab-5 with a range of 5,000 km, he said.

Dozens hurt in clashes with police

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Over 90 Israeli Arabs were injured over the weekend and dozens were arrested in clashes with police in the Wadi Ara area.

Police tried to evacuate protesters staging a sit-in on a plot of land the army has confiscated to be used as a training ground. Six border police were also lightly hurt in the clashes.

Most of the injured were brought to the hospitals with light to moderate injuries sustained from rubber-coated metal bullets and tear gas fired by police as the protesters hurled rocks and Molotov cocktails.

Among the wounded was Umm al-Fahm Mayor Sheikh Raad Saleh, who was hurt in his shoulder and back.

One injured man was evacuated to Tel Aviv's Ichilov Hospital in serious condition, a spokesperson for the Magen David Adom ambulance service said.

At the height of the day's clashes, angry demonstrators hurled rocks and Molotov cocktails at policemen, shouting "Death to the Jews" and "God is great." As night fell, residents burned tires at Umm al-Fahm's main access roads. Large police and army forces wielding automatic weapons and batons beat back demonstrators.

The police eventually announced that it was pulling its forces out of Umm al-Fahm after an agreement had been reached with local leaders. Under the deal, the land will remain in the hands of the residents until December, while officials from both sides try to reach a compromise.

A police statement said forces entered the area to evacuate a tent full of protesters in the village of Ma'awiyah after three weeks of negotiations failed to persuade the demonstrators to leave voluntarily.

But the Arabs said the forces entered the area without warning early in the morning to evacuate protesters.

Slave labor fund established

By DEIDRE BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

FRANKFURT — Another German firm has reversed course and agreed to establish a fund for slave laborers it employed during World War II.

The announcement by the electronic giant Siemens, of an $11.9 million fund to provide the humanitarian aid, came just a year after the company rejected responsibility for compensation payments for these laborers.

Siemens has not yet indicated whether the money will be dispersed in one-time payments or in regular instalments, but says it wants to provide quick and unbureaucratic help to needy victims forced to work at its plants during World War II.

The fund will be administered by individuals and organizations who are not connected to Siemens.

Earlier last month, the auto manufacturer Volkswagen announced a similar fund for former slave laborers that also will be managed by leading public figures. Both companies emphasize they have no legal obligation to make compensation payments but acknowledge their moral responsibility.

Iraq's cat-and-mouse game continues

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Last March, after the United Nations Security Council unanimously endorsed UN Secretary General Kofi Annan's agreement with Iraq on weapons inspections, U.S. President Bill Clinton issued a stern and unmistakable warning.

Mideast Analysis

Unless Iraqi President Saddam Hussein gave the United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) "immediate, unconditional and unrestricted" access to all suspected weapons sites, Iraq would face "the severest consequences," Clinton declared. In plain language, Clinton threatened Iraq with military action, following its refusal to allow UN inspectors to visit eight presidential sites scattered throughout the country.

But judging by recent developments, Clinton – distracted by the Monica Lewinsky sex scandal that threatens to scuttle his presidency – is doing precious little to force Iraq to comply with the UN accord.

Once again, Iraq is playing a provocative cat-and-mouse game with the UN.

Under his agreement with Annan, Saddam promised to abide fully by UN resolutions calling for the dismantling of Iraq's long-range missiles and its chemical, biological and nuclear weapons of mass destruction.

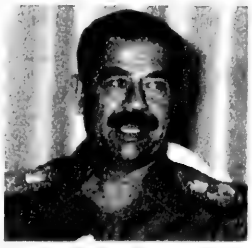
It was clearly understood that the economic sanctions imposed on Iraq would not be lifted unless Baghdad complied with these resolutions, passed in the wake of the 1991 Gulf War. The war, prosecuted by a coalition of nations spearheaded by the United States, broke out after Iraq refused to withdraw its invading army from Kuwait.

Iraq, considering these resolutions an infringement of its sovereignty and an impediment to its ambition of rebuilding its shattered armed forces and its regional influence, fell into a predictable pattern of alternatively cooperating with and obstructing the UN.

On Aug. 5, following a period of grudging cooperation, Iraq reverted to form. It would no longer cooperate with the UN because the director of UNSCOM, Richard Butler, had refused to certify that Iraq had destroyed its arsenal of banned weapons. The Iraqi parliament and the Revolutionary Command Council, the most powerful political body in Iraq, confirmed Iraq's decision.

As a result of Iraq's defiance, the UN Security Council on Sept. 9 suspended its regular reviews of sanctions, the latest of which was to have taken place in October.

At its last review in April, the Security Council decided to leave sanctions in place after weapons inspectors issued a scathing report accusing Iraq of failing to comply with UN resolutions.



Saddam Hussein

For its part, the United States charged Iraq with continuing to conceal the truth about its long-range missiles and its stocks of chemical and biological weapons.

The status of Iraq's nuclear weapons program remains unclear. Last spring, the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency disclosed that Iraq was not hiding any nuclear devices. But last month, the reputable Tel Aviv daily, Ha'aretz, reported that Iraq is in possession of three virtually operational nuclear bombs.

In the face of these disquieting facts, the United States' resolve against Iraq seems to have weakened, in sharp contrast to its aggressive posture during last winter's crisis, when Clinton dispatched an armada to the Persian Gulf to force Iraqi compliance with UN resolutions.

Scott Ritter Jr., a former American weapons inspector, claims that the Clinton administration has gone soft on Iraq by having blocked UNSCOM efforts to disarm Iraq. In its defence, Washington contends that its policy toward the Iraqi regime remains the same: to contain Iraq.

Objectively, however, there has been a subtle shift in American strategy.

Last year, the United States threatened to bomb Iraq, even though the Arab states, Russia, China and France opposed a resort to force. Today, the United States is trying to build a diplomatic consensus before unleashing its military might against Iraq.

Young novelist has unique approach to storytelling

By LORI FIRESTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Funny, real, vivid and recognizable are qualities that writer I.J. Schecter extends to the works of favorites Mark Twain and Stephen King, but the same could just as easily be said of his own abilities.

With a distinctive approach to storytelling, and a talent and maturity that belies his 26 years, Schecter is a man who truly understands his craft, as evidenced by The Bottom of the Mug, a collection of short stories that is as diversely original as it is captivating.

And why shouldn't it be, with such an author? At Thornlea Secondary School, when other students were worrying about who to ask to the prom, Schecter was writing the senior play.

At University of Western Ontario, people pledged fraternities, and Schecter wrote screenplays and edited the newspaper. And now, Schecter has published his first book, founded the Starving Romantics poetry competition, the biggest competition for romantic poetry in North America, and still finds time to indulge his love of reading, music and sports.

Schecter says he will play any sport where he can avoid sitting for great lengths of time, and is a two-time gold winner for Canadian baseball in the Maccabi games, as well as an avid hockey player.

Schecter started the Starving Romantics four years ago, frustrated by the lack of good traditional poetry being offered.

He sends out fliers annually to libraries, universities and writers' digests to ensure that he receives poetry with a broad appeal. A labor of love, it is self-financed, but it gives Schecter, as both organizer and judge, an opportunity to channel his passion for poetry.

It is often challenging and time-consuming for Schecter (and the six other appointed judges) to make their decisions, but Schecter is no stranger to hard work.

His demanding schedule includes a tour across Canada, appearing in selected bookstores in Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto and beyond. Schecter is thrilled by the positive response people have had to his work.

So positive, in fact, that the book tour has expanded to the United States. "Ninety percent of writing a book is promoting it."

His recent invitation to participate in both the Word on the Street and the Eden Mills Writers Festival is proof that Schecter is as good a writer as he is a promoter. The Word on the Street assembles writers from all across Canada, and is recognized as a showcase for potential raconteurs on the rise.

The Eden Mills Festival, which took place recently just outside Guelph, is the second largest literary festival in Canada, so it was quite a coup for such a young author to be invited.

His national tour will take him to Montreal where he'll be at the Double Hook bookstore on Oct.3.

Upon reading his collection (which ranges from adulterous love to bumbling mobsters to satire on the workplace), one is caught up by the richness of ideas.

His philosophy is simple: "The story comes first; character, setting and plot are secondary...if it's fun and it moves, it will turn its own pages."

His biting commentary on romance was recently featured in the Globe and Mail, and Schecter has seen his work in literary journals such as Canadian Fiction Magazine and The Fiddlehead, as well as the American journal Eureka Literary Magazine, who rated Schecter's The Overbearing Camper (a tale about God attending summer camp) as the story of the year.

All of Schecter's success has not spoiled him; he remains refreshingly modest, admitting that he sees his style as "continually evolving," inspired by other authors who continue to teach him how much more he has to learn, so that he can one day work as a writer full time.

Schecter is currently working on a novel about a fictitious baseball team in Rhode Island, and hopes to have it finished by next year, work schedule permitting.

It is often difficult for Schecter to juggle his work with his writing, but he "loves the feeling of a hard day's work and being exhausted at the end of it."

Travel Talk

BY BILL GLADSTONE

FINGER LAKES ABLAZE WITH FALL COLORS

I'm told the Finger Lakes region of New York State is never more beautiful than during autumn, when these rolling hills and valleys are ablaze with seasonal yellows, oranges, reds and browns.

The region's charms were no less evident, however, when I toured the region in late August at the peak of a busy tourist season. In only a few days, I managed to take in a pleasing assortment of cultural and historic sites as well as several memorable natural wonders.

Letchworth State Park, which begins about 35 miles south of Rochester, was a surprise. Known as the "Grand Canyon of the East," this serpentine river-carved valley is very picturesque, with 600-foot cliffs towering over the Genesee River. Besides various camping and recreational facilities, the park offers an interesting 1912 museum on Indian and geological history. It also offers the Victorian-era Glen Iris Inn, situated in a remote natural setting beside a large waterfall, far from the madding crowd.

The town of Corning, N.Y., is renowned for its glass, especially Corningware, but not one piece of the latter was in evidence at the Corning Museum of Glass. This world-famous institution houses some 30,000 objects representing 3,500 years of glass craftsmanship and design. It's interesting to note that the section on pre-Roman glass contains examples from Hebrew, Egyptian and other ancient cultures of the Middle East. Don't miss the glass-blowing demonstrations.

With more than 100 inviting shops, Corning's historic Market Street looks similar to the way it supposedly looked in the 19th century, when townsfolk, fearing their hamlet would vanish, used $50,000 to lure a major glass company here from Brooklyn, N.Y. The local Rockwell Museum features one of the best collections of American Western art this side of the Mississippi.

There's easily enough to do in Corning to support a visit of several days. The town boasts several fine B&B hotels such as the Rosewood Inn (607-962-3253), whose proprietor, Suzanne Sanders, notes that Corning is equidistant from Toronto and New York (roughly 4½ hours by car), and thus a perfect stopping place for motor traffic between the two cities.

Spectacular hikable gorge

Driving north from Corning, one reaches Watkins Glen, a spectacular, hikable gorge at the southern tip of Seneca Lake. Continuing along Seneca's shores, one passes some of the many wineries in the region; oenophiles may follow the Seneca Lake Wine Trail. At Glenora Wine Cellars in Dundee, for example, one may taste Glenora's wine and learn how it is produced by watching a 12-minute video.

Moving eastward towards Syracuse, I stopped at numerous attractions en route. The Rose Hill Mansion in Geneva, N.Y., an elegant Greek Revival mansion built in 1839, seems a perfect reflection of the genteel, neoclassical values that dominated society's upper classes in post-Jacksonian America. Women's Rights National Historical Park in Seneca Falls, N.Y., is an assemblage of buildings associated with Elizabeth Cady Stanton and other pioneers of women's suffrage.

Syracuse is a university town with an industrial base (population 165,000). Its Erie Canal Museum is housed in a building in which cargo boats were once weighed as they plied the canal. Equally intriguing is the Onondaga Historical Association Museum, which details the city's colorful history. Another Syracuse institution worth visiting is the Milton J. Rubenstein Museum of Science & Technology.

Like Toronto, Syracuse has an annual exhibition whose roots are deep in the Victorian era. Anyone who has experienced the Canadian National Exhibition will feel right at home at the New York State Fair, held each year for the two weeks or so culminating in Labor Day.

The state fair boasts buildings devoted to food, technology, horticulture and other themes, a thronging midway, big-name entertainers, and enough red-and-blue sashes and ribbons to make you feel as though you'd stepped into a 1940s movie starring Judy Garland and Mickey Rooney. It's pure déclassé Americana and irresistible fun for children.

You'll find no kosher hot dogs nor any other kosher edibles at the state fair, of course. For that, try any large branch of the Wegman's supermarket chain. I went into Wegman's in Rochester, Corning and a few other towns, and was impressed by large kosher sections that would rival those of almost any general supermarket in Toronto.

Family Matters

Rich Program by Jewish Family & Child Service

On Yom Kippur we ask God to forgive us for our mistakes. However, our Sages tell us that to be forgiven, we ourselves must first learn to forgive both others and ourselves. We cannot expect God to be forgiving if we do not forgive. The following excellent programs offered by Toronto's Jewish Family and Child Service might make this process easier for those Jews who are separated, divorced or isolated as adults or children within our community. There is far too much anger out there. For further information or to reserve space call Pat Lieberman (416) 638-7800 ext. 215 (Toronto) or Elinor Gertner (905) 882-2331 ext. 32 (York Region).

The Single Parent Challenge (6 weeks): A group to discuss the feelings, concerns and skills needed to be a single parent. Topics will include Time Management, Stress Management, and Balancing Personal Needs with Parental Responsibilities.

One Family, Two Homes (3 sessions): A group program for families experiencing separation and divorce. Children will participate in separate age-appropriate groups. Sessions in parents' groups will address Helpful Hints for Keeping Kids out of the Conflict, and Overview of the New Family Law Legislation: Impact of Separation & Divorce on Children.

Part-time Father's Group (6 weeks): A group to help fathers who are not living primarily with their children to redefine their roles as fathers while exploring the area of solo parenting. The goal is to improve fathers' relationship with their children, thereby enhancing the self-esteem of both children and fathers.

Divorce: It's Not My Idea (8 weeks): A group for individuals for whom the separation was an unwanted event. Topics include Leaving Behind Feelings of Loss and Grief, Responding to Anger/Depression in New Ways to Regain Control, and Building New Relationships with Children and Friends.

Adult Relationships Group (ongoing): A group for adults 25+ who are dissatisfied with the quality of their relationships. The group helps participants gain understanding of how personal issues can impact on the formation of healthy relationships. (Assessment interview required).

Young Adults Group (ongoing): A group for adults 18 to 25, many of whom have separated or divorced parents. These young adults are dealing with such developmental issues as separating from their families of origin, developing independent lives, forming intimate relationships, and developing career plans.

When You're About to Separate: What to Tell the Kids? This workshop will focus on children's needs just prior to and in the early stages of separation. Typical children's reactions and questions will be addressed. Ideas and strategies to best meet your child's needs will be discussed.

Dealing with Life Cycle Events: Lone-parent families face important issues in coping with Jewish life cycle events: How will I cope with my "ex" in planning a wedding, Bar or Bat Mitzvah? Where will the children be for the first seder? Shall I go to my ex-mother-in-law's funeral?

Grandparents in Families Where Children Have Divorced: Grandparents can play a very important role for their grandchildren after a divorce. Topics to be discussed are: How to Grieve the Loss of your Child's Marriage, How to Maintain a Climate of Love and Security for Your Grandchildren, and How to Remain Neutral when Conflicts Take Place Between Separating Parents.

If you find yourself in need of such services, you might also consider consulting a trusted Rabbinical advisor; spiritual advice is also quite important.

May you be inscribed for Health and Happiness.

RADIO-A-THON HELPS FEED KIDS BREAKFAST

Marty Galin and Avrum Rosensweig, hosts of the Marty and Avrum's Restaurant and Food Show on AM radio station 640 each Sunday morning, are planning a four-hour radio-a-thon on Oct. 11 to raise funds for the Toronto Breakfast Club, which tries to ensure that local children have a proper breakfast each day. Another charity to benefit from the radio-a-thon is Give Kids The World.

The radio-a-thon will feature a lively roster of chefs, celebs, singers and bands. The public is invited to phone in during the show to make donations, or even to join the duo for breakfast. The event runs 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. at the Crown Plaza Hotel, 225 Front St. W.

Rosensweig is no stranger to raising money for charity. A former fundraiser for the United Jewish Appeal, he is a founder and vice-president of Ve'Ahavta, a Toronto-based charity that seeks to send medical relief and vital supplies to international trouble spots.

Special Geminis: Actor-director Al Waxman and comedy writers Frank Shuster and the late Johnny Wayne are among special award recipients to be honored at the 13th Gemini Awards on Oct. 3 and 4.

Waxman is slated to receive the Earle Grey Award for making a significant contribution to the international profile of Canadian television. Shuster and Wayne are being honored with the Margaret Collier Award, also for their significant contribution to the international profile of Canadian television.

According to a Gemini news release, Wayne and Shuster "set standards for generations of comedians and continue to be role models both domestically and internationally."

Quotable Quote: Aaron Lansky, head of the National Yiddish Book Centre in Amherst, Mass., recently commented that the American Jewish community may be on the verge of "a renaissance such as the Jewish people have never known. After decades of frustration, I think we're finally beginning to understand that the best way to combat assimilation and intermarriage is not through sermons, studies, handwringing and harangues, but by building a Jewish culture in America that's so vibrant, so creative, so full of history, humor, intellectual depth and human sensibility that it becomes irresistible."

Actor enjoys artistic freedom found in Canada

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Richard Greenblatt the term "rich actor" is a contradiction in terms.

Fresh from a long run in Two Pianos, Four Hands, with co-star Ted Dykstra, which sold out for six weeks at the Royal Alexandra Theatre, Greenblatt told The CJN that he is a "thousandaire" not a "millionaire."

He did concede that he made enough money to renovate the family home on Palmerston Gardens.

"But I'm just an ordinary member of the community as I have been for 25 years," he said, as he plunged into rehearsals for Criminal Genius, the George Walker play being revived at Factory Theatre, Oct. 3 to Nov. 1 (504-9971).

Greenblatt plays the small time hood Rolly, who with his addled son, botches a kidnapping job and thus sets off a series of hilarious events. It's the kind of comic acting that Greenblatt loves.

"A change is as good as a rest. It's like a holiday," he said of his role in Criminal Genius, but quickly acknowledged that "the love that was palpable over the footlights at the Royal Alex still fuels me."

Born in Montreal, and a resident of Toronto since the 1970s, the actor said he was a "red diaper baby," born of Communist parents.

There was no religious element in the Greenblatt home but the family was "culturally and sociologically" Jewish, he said.

Now that he and his wife have three children, he said he is more attracted to the traditional side of Judaism, and Natasha, 13, Michael, 10, and Luke, 8, all went to shul on Rosh Hashanah.

Greenblatt is planning to stay in Canada. "New York is not a place to bring up kids. And there is more freedom artistically in Canada."

With Diane Flacks, he is co-writing Sibs, a new play, which will be workshopped in November and open in 1999.

He is an enthusiastic booster of the move by Factory Theatre to buy its old church property at Adelaide and Bathurst streets for $1.5 million from Allied Canadian Corporation, which has already contributed $500 as the first corporate donor supporting the purchase.

The theatre is trying to raise $125,000 for a down payment before Dec. 17 this year, the closing date for the sale of the building.

"We will soon be paying significantly less in mortgage interest than we would be in rent," said artistic director Ken Gass.

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mitch Moldofsky is a young playwright and filmmaker who believes that a 15-minute film is a good way to get people talking about the possibility of pre-marital pregnancy, mixed marriages and the controversy around circumcision.

In The Briss, his first film, Moldofsky introduces us to Sonya (Lori Pearlstein) and Graham (Christopher Robertson), who have their families agreeing to the mixed marriage and expecting it to be fruitful. But Sonya is afraid of getting pregnant and uses this as a pretext for breaking up with a confused, but loyal, Graham. At the end, Sonya wonders whether she did the right thing.

The couple is at a briss for Sonya's sister's baby son when Sonya decides to drop her bombshell. The relatives and friends, gathered for the occasion, debate the value and necessity of the traditional ceremony.

Moldofsky's hope is that the film will be purchased by high schools and marriage counsellors to spark discussion among groups wrestling with these problems.

It was premiered at a film evening sponsored by the Liaison of Independent Filmmakers of Toronto (LIFT) at the Royal Cinema, Sept. 16. Ten films were shown at the LIFT program.

Among those in The Briss, some with speaking roles and others as extras, are Mel Downey, Tomas Chovanec, Razie Brownstone, Neil and Marcia Schulman, Dani Holden, Leon King, Shana Elman, Judy, Marty and Brian Kates, Al Lopez, Rhoda and Stanley Moldofsky, Brent Perlman, and David Waverman.

Moldofsky is also the author of Brothers, a play about two Jewish brothers, one who takes up an Orthodox way of life in Israel, and one who travels the secular path in Toronto.

Jewish Brigade featured

The story of the Jewish Brigade in World War II is a fascinating one and shows that, in fact, Jews were willing to and did fight back against the Nazi regime.

Airing on History Television Oct 5, 9p.m., In Our Own Hands: The Jewish Brigade tells this story through candid interviews and archival footage.

The Jews living in Palestine at the outbreak of war wanted Churchill to allow them to form an all-Jewish unit, but bowing to political pressure Churchill was not in favor of the idea.

It was only in 1944 that Churchill went against his advisors, and in a typically dramatic speech said the race that suffered the most should have a chance at fighting back.

Trained by the British, the Jewish Brigade formed a big part of the Israeli army in the War of Independence. Disciplined and experienced this might explain how – despite being outnumbered – they were able to resist the Arab attack.

Heather Reisman: Indigo Books, Music & Cafe:

Bookstore has 'interface' with Jewish community

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Heather Reisman takes exception to the accusation made in a Toronto newspaper column ten months ago that Indigo Books, Music & Cafe, the well-publicized bookstore chain she launched last year, is for people who wouldn't normally go to bookstores.

"That's just a ludicrous statement," she says calmly, her pleasant mien barely ruffled as she considers a Dec. 4, 1997 Toronto Star column by Jim Coyle, in which he presented the view of an independent bookseller whose store is located near Indigo's Yonge and Eglinton store in Toronto.

As a longtime book lover – her first purchase, after she began receiving allowance at age 7, was a book – Reisman says she is "the natural consumer for whom we are building Indigo.

"Ask any publisher, anybody who shops at Indigo. See what they say about the knowledge of the books, the quality of the books."

To illustrate the care taken in book selection, Reisman notes that Rabbi John Moscowitz has agreed to serve as an adviser on the Yonge/Eglinton store's Judaica section.

That particular store has much "interface" with the Jewish community, including crossover events with the lecture series sponsored at Holy Blossom Temple by Reisman and her husband Gerry Schwartz, chief executive of Onex Corporation.

Each Indigo outlet is similarly geared to its respective community in terms of store design and book selection, according to an Indigo news release.

While it's early to assess Indigo's profitability, the business has been "quite successful on an operating basis," says Reisman. After raising over $25 million in private placement of equity to launch the business, "we're tracking exactly where we want to track, which is excellent."

Since opening its inaugural store in Burlington last year, Indigo has opened two more and is in the process of opening another four. That will soon bring the total to seven stores: three in the Toronto area, and one each in Montreal, Calgary, Burlington and Kingston.

A typical Indigo store has between 50 and 100 employees. By the end of this year, Indigo will have created over 450 jobs.

Reisman expects to have opened about 25 stores in the next three years. That would bring Indigo into the same league as Chapters Inc., which was the result of a 1995 merger between Coles Book Stores and SmithBooks, and which now has over 30 stores.

But "it's not just about creating a big box full of books," notes Reisman, veering from the bottom line to less tangible aspects of business. "The whole idea is to create a haven for booklovers, a candy store for the mind and a spa for the soul and a haven for the heart. This is about creating a place where the sight of it, the smell of it [possibly from flowers or scented candles], the sound of it, the visual, and then of course the service, is a whole experience."

Life is tough and busy, she explains. "There's a sense that we want to create something that is beautiful as best we can. People need some of that."

The name Indigo arose out of a brainstorming session and the idea of "*in*spiring, *in*forming and *in*dulging" customers. Then someone mentioned Mood Indigo as a "fantastic" piece of music, and the name stuck.

Although Reisman maintains that Indigo is "about as far away from the standard big-box store as you can get," to the untrained eye a typical Indigo bookstore – with its 18,000 to 42,000 square feet of space, 100,000 or so book titles, comfortable seating and the requisite trendy coffee bar – is not unlike the other "big box" bookstores. The café, however, is licensed, and finishing touches like unusual names for store sections (Wraptures for gift wrap, Fictional Woods for fiction) add a distinctive note.

Indigo is aggressively pro-Canadian, promoting Canadian books and writers in its Indigo Guide and with in-store events like appearances of Canadian authors like Nino Ricci and Ann-Marie MacDonald at the launch of the Yonge/Eglinton store.

One of its store sections – and themes – is The World Needs More Canada, and Reisman points out that the business is 100 percent Canadian-owned.

Reisman's been told Indigo has a feminine touch and even that it's a really heimish place. "Heimish" has never been so upscale.

To a certain extent, Reisman has created her own sense of home at Indigo. Half a dozen of her staffers were with her at Cott Corporation, the beverage company she led as president from 1992 to 1994. Some former staffers had approached her about the move; others she sought out herself.

After leaving Cott, Reisman was involved in an attempt to bring the American book superstore Borders Inc. to Canada, but the plan was quashed by the federal government's Investment Review Board.

Heather Reisman

The move from beverages to books was not as big as one might expect, according to Reisman. Serendipity and destiny both played a role, she says. "I am the kind of person who enjoys creating things from scratch...My strength was in the service businesses, in building a great culture, in large-scale distribution and I knew that I wanted to do something where I cared passionately about the product."

Although soft drinks don't inspire the same passion books do, there's a joy in bringing any great product to market, Reisman says.

But her enjoyment of Indigo has been tempered by unpleasantness.

Chapters, which has had a virtual monopoly as the only big-box bookstore chain in Canada, launched a lawsuit after Reisman hired a former manager of theirs. It was subsequently withdrawn; a countersuit by Indigo still stands.

Last year, Reisman dismissed as "absurd" the idea of a book war between Indigo and Chapters in an interview for Maclean's magazine. "At best it's David and Goliath, and we don't even have our slingshot fully made yet."

Sitting in her BCE Place office high above Toronto on a hot summer day this year, she amends her statement, but still says there's no war as far as she's concerned. "Let's say our slingshot is ready."

Later in the interview, weighing her words, carefully, Reisman adds, "The level of behavior by Chapters' leadership to literally eliminate Indigo is more extreme than anything I have witnessed in my 25-year career."

Reisman, who turns 50 this year, ran her own strategic change firm, Paradigm Consulting, Inc., for 18 years. By the mid-1980s she had been appointed to four corporate boards, the only woman director at three of the four companies.

Her plans for Indigo include the launch of an online bookselling service. "We're inspired by companies like Amazon," she says in response to a question about the effects on her business of Amazon.com, the phenomenally successful Seattle-based on-line bookseller.

And in turn, it looks as if Indigo has done some inspiring of its own. This summer Chapters launched in-store CD sales at a select stores.

Imitation is "flattering at one level, but it does encourage us to keep certain things under wraps." The anticipated date of Indigo's Internet launch is thus "a secret," Reisman says.

(Subsequent to the interview for this article, Chapters launched its own website.)

She maintains there will always be a place for the small independent bookseller, although she concedes that stores like hers provide a "challenge.

"I would say small booksellers are challenged today by a whole number of things – more demanding consumers, a higher need for choice. Everyone's challenged by that. I think to some extent they are affected when there's more competition in the marketplace, but they're affected, period. Whether or not there are superstores, there would have been an increasing challenge."

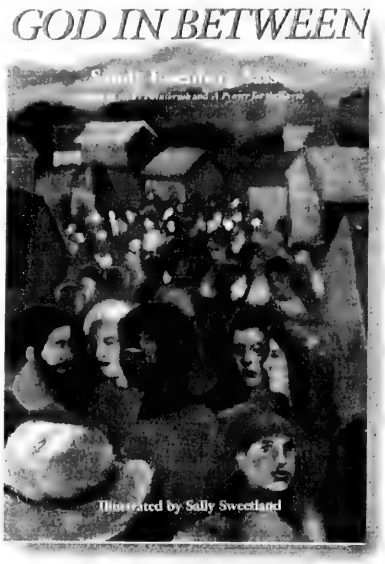
Townsfolk look for God

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Can you imagine what it would be like to live in a town where there were no roads, and nearly all the houses had no windows? Wouldn't you be scared?

Sandy Eisenberg Sasso, who has written several wonderful books for children, including God's Paintbrush, a story of the rainbow, and A Prayer for the Earth, a story about Na'amah, the wife of Noah, has written a book you will really enjoy, called God In Between (Jewish Lights, 1998).

God In Between is about a town which is like the one I talked about. Because there were no roads, it was very difficult for the people to go anywhere because they kept falling over rocks and into holes. Without windows, they never knew what time of day it was, and, what was worse, they could not see their neighbors.



They decided that the only way to get help was to find God and ask Him to do something to make things better for them. The problem was, not only could they not figure out how to make plans with their neighbors, they couldn't even go from place to place to look for God.

Two houses did have one window each, and the people asked those who lived in those houses to find God for them.

The man and woman overcame many difficulties, and went all over the world, but did not have any luck. When they returned, they built roads between their two houses, and made lots of windows. That's when they realized where God was. Can you figure it out?

The pictures by Sally Sweetland are spectacular, full of bright colors and strong details.

God in Between is every bit as excellent a book as Sasso's other books. Your parents will enjoy it just as much as you will.

No halachic objection to cloning: Israeli expert

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There is no intrinsic halachic objection to cloning, according to an Israeli expert in Halachah and medical ethics. However, it is necessary to recognize both the potential benefits and the possible dangers.

Dr. Abraham Steinberg, director of medical ethics at Hebrew University Hadassah Hospital and a pediatric neurologist at Shaare Zedek Medical Centre and Bikur Cholim Hospital, was speaking at the second annual Audey Stanleigh Memorial Lecture, held recently at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill.

"After all, God Himself did the first cloning – Adam and Eve," Steinberg said.

Some of the benefits of cloning can be to renew the functioning of damaged cells, as in Parkinson's or Alzheimer diseases, where the mature nerve cells have lost the ability to function; to help infertile couples; and to halt the uncontrolled replication of cells.

There is no halachic problem with cloning either animals or humans for organ transplantation, he said. There are even fewer problems growing stem cells; that is, undifferentiated cells which later become specialized.

Since human beings are considered partners with God in improving the world, it is considered obligatory to use whatever technology becomes available to help those in need of it, Steinberg said.

However, he warned, we must be aware of the potential problems. First, he said, there are the eugenic possibilities, such as cloning a Nobel Prize winner, which sounds very desirable. On the other hand, "one could also clone a Saddam Hussein."

There would be the psychological and sociological problems of losing individuality and identity, "when there are 20 people exactly the same as me. Also, it is individual differences that create a healthy society."

The very survival of the human race could be in danger, since "if there is no genetic variation, one disease could wipe out the whole human race."

Steinberg also warned of a potential change in the world social order. "If we create the chance of reproducing in a non-sexual way, it means that we don't need a nuclear family, parents or intimate relations. These are all important from a Jewish point of view."

It is impossible to stop technological development, Steinberg asserted. "If an idea can be formulated, it probably will be. Also, there are powerful lobbies with vested interests in promoting cloning."

The world, he said, is a "global village. If you stop development in one country, it goes to other countries, and comes in anyway." He cited in vitro fertilization, which was originally banned in the United States, developed in England, and then introduced back into the United States.

The world's religions have different opinions on cloning. Roman Catholics are opposed to it, insisting that the beginning of life must be natural. Protestants, he said, disagree among themselves, while Muslims allow it with limitations.

Halachah, he repeated, allows it, with qualifications. First, Steinberg said, "the actual act [of cloning], and the results, must not be contrary to Halachah. For instance, we are prohibited from interbreeding – such as creating a mule, a cross between a donkey and a horse."

If we clone a human being, he said, we must decide if what we have created is a person or a golem, a being without a soul. "A golem can't be counted in a minyan, and killing him cannot be considered murder, since he was not born of a woman."

There is, in addition, the question of whether cloning fulfils the obligation of peru u'revu, to be fruitful and multiply, he said. "We have to redefine words we never had to define before, such as father and mother."

Steinberg considers that there will be halachic solutions to these problems.

Audey Stanleigh died in August, 1996, at the age of 21, after a valiant battle against leukemia, which included a bone marrow transplant. Friends and family have continued the fundraising that began during his lifetime.

Ilan Meister, who has been active in these efforts, presented a cheque for $35,000, partly raised by the highly successful Hoops for Hope basketball tournament, to Dr. Melvin Freedman, an active researcher in the field of leukemia research and treatment. The Audey Stanleigh Leukemia Research Foundation is devoted to finding a complete cure for all forms of leukemia.

The evening was also dedicated to the memory of Mindy Rosenberg, a mother of three and active community volunteer, who succumbed to leukemia last year, at the age of 42.

Rabbi Baruch Taub, the family's rabbi, described Stanleigh's taharah, purity, faith in God, love of Torah, as well as his sense of humor and love of having fun.

An Israeli bomb squad combs through the wreckage of a bus stop in the Hebrew University complex for clues after a small device exploded. [RNS/Reuters photo]

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — When a bomb exploded on September 24 at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, overseas students got their first taste of what it's really like to live in Israel. Here for the year to study and live in Israel, students at the university's Rothberg School for Overseas Students were at the site of Israel's most recent bombing attack.

A soldier in the IDF was the only person at the bus stop on the university's Mount Scopus campus, which is also a popular hitchhiking station for soldiers. Jerusalemite Amir Davidian, 20, was moderately wounded, no one was killed.

While security forces called to the scene combed the campus for other explosives, Canadian overseas student, Jenny Lewis was in her dorm room less than a block away.

"I heard a loud blast," said Lewis, who was eating breakfast at the time that the bomb went off. "I knew the minute I heard it that it was a bomb."

Lewis, 21, a third-year Queen's University student studying history and English, arrived in Israel on August 2 for a year of study abroad.

She was getting ready for her class, which started at 8:30 a.m., when the bomb went off.

"I was not tempted to go home [to Toronto]," Lewis, said. "My teacher said not to worry and that life goes on. She said, 'If you live in fear, you're letting the terrorist win.'" Still, Lewis admitted, "I'm living in fear."

Twenty-year-old Shelly Brenner, thought the blast was just another truck driving by her noisy dorms. But when she went outside to walk to her morning class, the explosion really hit home. Brenner described the site where the bomb had exploded as a "big mess."

"It was so close to us," said Brenner, a French and sociology major from the University of Western Ontario in London. "It made a little more of an impact on me.

"I think terrorists want to scare people. I don't want them to win," Brenner said referring to the fact that she would continue to take buses in Israel.

Davidian, the IDF soldier, suffered injuries to his head, and was listed in satisfactory condition at Hadassah-University Hospital in Ein Kerem. He was struck by fragments while bent over, tying his shoelaces. Police said he could have been more seriously injured if he were standing up. President Ezer Weizman visited him at the hospital.

While no group claimed responsibility for the attack which totally destroyed the bus stop and shattered its glass everywhere, many people hypothesized that it was an attempt at halting the already fragile peace process.

'If you live in fear, you're letting the terrorist win'

"This is not the way to stop the peace process," said Lewis. "This is not the way to start the [Jewish] new year."

Jerusalem Police Chief Cmdr. Yair Yitzhaki said the bomb was probably placed by terrorists. There had been no specific warnings about the Sept. 24 attack, The Jerusalem Post reported him as saying, but police remained on high alert for a retaliatory attack following the security forces' killing of the Awadallah brothers. Imad and Adel Awadallah, Hamas terrorists, were killed by the IDF in Hebron on Sept. 10.

The bomb could have done far greater damage if it had been set off half an hour later. The international school's courses begin at 8:30 a.m., and many students would have been in the area of the explosion. When the bomb exploded at 8 a.m., no one was in the school.

Still, those that were in the vicinity were affected.

"People around me weren't as shaken up as I was," said Brenner. "It's been a rough day."

Meanwhile in related developments Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and U.S. President Bill Clinton made plans to meet at the White House to discuss, among other things, the current developments in the Middle East.

NFL lineups have some Jewish content

By HARLAN C. ABBEY
Special to The CJN

BUFFALO — The National Football League (NFL) kicked off its season recently with six Jewish players ready for action – eventually.

Only three players suited up on opening game: lineman/long snapper Adam Schreiber of the Atlanta Falcons, tight end Scott Slutzker, recently traded from Indianapolis to the New Orleans Saints, and punter Josh Miller of the Pittsburgh Steelers.

Ironically, the other three players have the best chance of starting with their teams, once they get off the injured list. They are former All-Pro lineman Harris Barton of the San Francisco 49ers, fullback Chad Levitt of the Oakland Raiders and defensive end Mitch Marrow of Carolina Panthers.

Starting position with the Raiders

Levitt, a second-year pro who was a star tailback at Cornell, seemed to have won a starting position on the Raiders until he was injured.

Last year, he started the final two games of the season and made two key blocks on Junior Seau on two short touchdown runs by a Raider tailback. He also caught two passes for 24 yards and ran twice for a total of three yards.

Marrow had his senior season at Pennsylvania limited to four games because of mononucleosis, but he still showed enough to be drafted in the third round.

Standing 6-foot-4 and weighing 285 lbs., Morrow is a defensive end who set Penn records for sacks in one season (16.5) and tackles for a loss (13).

Barton, meanwhile, is in his 12th year with the 49ers but he missed all of last season because of knee surgery. Now 34, the former University of North Carolina All-American was the surprise of pre-season camp before being placed on injured reserve the week before the season's Labor Day kickoff.

Slutzker, a 6-foot-4, 250-lb. native of New Jersey, played his college ball in Iowa. In his second season with the Colts last year, Slutzker started in two games. He had his first career catches against New England (16 yards) and two for 16 yards against the Jets a few weeks later. Other than that, he played mostly on special teams, making 10 tackles and picking up one fumble. He's expected to see more action with New Orleans.

Schreiber, a native of Texas, is in his 15th pro season although he started only 33 of 148 games with Seattle, New Orleans, Philadelphia, New York Jets and Giants, Minnesota and the Falcons. His busiest years were 1987 when he started 12 games with the Eagles and 1993, when he started 16 games with the Vikings.

The 6-foot-4, 298-lb. veteran is credited with the accurate snapping that helped kicker Morten Anderson connect on 23 of 27 field goals and 35 straight extra points. He also helped punter Dan Stryzinski lead the NFL with fair catches forced, with 45.

Miller, a native of Rockaway, NY, began his pro career with Baltimore in the Canadian Football League. Twice CFL punting leader (once with a 45.3 yard average), the University of Arizona hoofer averaged 42.6 yards per punt in the NFL, with the longest soaring 72 yards.

Other Jewish players who didn't hang on this year are rookie free agent defensive end Brent Burnstein, cut by Arizona, offensive lineman Alex Burnstein, who played on Baltimore's reserve squad last year, and seven-year veteran offensive lineman Ariel Solomon, let go by Detroit.

Missing from the sidelines this season will be longtime coach Marv Levy of the Bills and running backs coach Joe Brodsky, who spent eight years with the Cowboys.

The Inside Back

Waking up to the IRB's woes

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Why did it take an infantile, gratuitous and quite stupid incident to rouse our national advocacy organizations into finally seeing that there's a problem at Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB)?

It was deputy IRB chair John Frecker's ill-advised "Sieg heil!" gesture – uttered, as he explained, in response to a management tactic he considered heavy-handed – that finally lit a fire under Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada. The organizations, horrified at Frecker's behavior, demanded an inquiry not only into how the IRB dealt with the incident, but also into long-held allegations of bias and anti-Semitism on the part of board members.

Hello.

The IRB was rife with rumors of anti-Jewish and anti-Israel bias for years before the Frecker foofaraw. While Jewish immigration lawyers or lawyers with Jewish clients will tell you they never experienced overt bias from a panel; what has gone on behind closed doors is another matter.

It began in the early 1990s with a new phenomenon: ex-Soviets who had gone to Israel on Operation Exodus started to spring-board to the West, including Canada, as "refugees" from the Jewish state.

Typically, the asylum-seekers claimed that while in Israel, they were discriminated against, harassed, denied jobs and housing, and even beaten because of their mixed marriages and questionable status as Jews.

Canada was blasted as the only democracy in the world to believe the stories of persecution, and it accepted hundreds of ex-Soviets. IRB panels in Montreal, especially, swallowed tales of horror in Israel, hook, line and sinker.

The issue finally came to a head in 1994, when Jerusalem publicly called on Ottawa to stop accepting the claimants, saying that Israel, a democracy, does not produce refugees, and that stories of persecution were bogus. The IRB's response? Essentially, it was "mind your own business," and panels went right on accepting Israeli refugees, even to this day, albeit in much smaller numbers.

Evidence supplied by the Israeli embassy showed that while ex-Soviets may face discrimination, they did not have a "well-founded" fear of persecution in Israel – a requirement under international rules to successfully win asylum. For the most part, IRB panels chose to ignore Israel's entreaties. Was it because the evidence conflicted with their pre-conceived views about Israel?

The flip side of the coin took place in 1994, when an IRB panel denied asylum to an elderly Jewish woman fleeing violent anti-Semitism in her native Azerbaijan. Why was she turned down? Because she was Jewish.

That's right. The panel said that because the woman was Jewish, she could get automatic citizenship in Israel. She was told to apply to go to Israel under that country's Law of Return, whether she wanted to or not, and forget about Canada. The decision was spine-chilling; straight out of None is Too Many, and a perverse reading of the Law of Return. What's more, the Federal Court of Canada actually upheld it in a subsequent appeal.

Lawyers and refugee advocates were outraged. But where were Congress and B'nai Brith? If they were working "behind the scenes," as they like to say, it was far behind the scenes – their work eclipsed by mainstream organizations like the Canadian Council for Refugees, whose rich study tore the court's spurious interpretation of the Law of Return to shreds.

Jewish organizations should have been screaming from the rooftops that the rulings from the IRB and the court were nothing short of malevolent. Instead, we got the usual anodyne press releases.

My theory has always been that Congress and B'nai Brith – indeed Jewish advocacy groups everywhere – are great in front-line situations, like swastikas scrawled in elevators or alleged pro-Hitler remarks from a former hockey player, but less adept at identifying and tackling more complex, administrative forms of bias.

Ironically, the "sieg heil" was loud enough for everyone to take notice.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I have been taking care of my 87-year-old aunt in my home for the past 10 years. I also have a family of my own to take care of. My children are teenagers and my husband has arthritis. My aunt has developed a lot of difficulty with her balance and recently has had several serious falls in my home. After a lot of thought, I moved her into a nursing home. The care she now receives is better for her, but she is lonely. I am having trouble coping with my guilt. What do you suggest?

MB

Dear MB,

Placing a relative in a long-term care facility is always difficult, even when it is in everybody's best interest. It is normal to feel guilty and have trouble adapting to this change. However, your role as a caregiver will continue, and in order to cope with the stresses involved, you might find it helpful to join a support group for family caregivers. Support groups provide new methods of dealing with the challenges of caregiving. Also, you can find support from being with other caregivers who are sharing similar experiences to yours. Often the nursing home, your local public health department and/or Jewish family services provide these services.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal

THE ESTATES OF SUNNYBROOK

Splendor Endures at The Estates

Situated on 52 tree-filled acres not far from downtown Toronto is the elegant and graceful Estates of Sunnybrook. Comprising The Vaughan Estate and McLean House, The Estates provides the ambience and richness to make your celebration special.

Here you will find richly appointed rooms, and some of the most exquisite cuisine in our city, along with facilities to accommodate weddings with as many as 150 guests. Kosher catering is available.

The splendor of The Estates is evident in every detail

McLean House:
Stately Sophistication and Elegance

The history of McLean House dates back to 1929, when James Stanley McLean commissioned innovative Canadian architect Eric Arthur to design a unique home for the McLean family.

The result was BayView – now known as McLean House – one of Ontario's most splendid Georgian-style mansions. Set amid the natural beauty of Gordon Culham's landscaping, McLean House is as magnificent today as when it was built.

Vaughan Estate:
The Grandeur Of a Baronial Manor House

The Vaughan Estate – originally known as Donningvale – was built in 1931 in a simple Elizabethan style typical of a large stone country manor house. The exceptional renovation has retained its historic nature, providing two elegantly appointed ballrooms, each with a capacity of 150.

The grandeur is also apparent throughout the beautifully sculptured gardens, walkways and tiered patio, gardens and stone pathways overlooking the Don River ravine. This makes The Vaughan a photo opportunity for your bridal group, family and friends.

Planning Your Wedding?

With a history of hosting weddings dating back to the 1930s, The Estates' wedding specialists carry this tradition of excellence into the 1990s and the next millennium. Personalized service and attention to detail are the qualities that make The Estates an idyllic backdrop for a memorable wedding.

Wedding couples look to The Estates for personalized service, central location, opulent interiors, free parking and superb cuisine with kosher catering available. Another important benefit when choosing The Estates is knowing that revenues go to research at the world-renowned Sunnybrook Health Science Centre. For more information call The Estates at 487-3841.

When Only The Best Will Do

Our two incredible mansions, McLean House and The Vaughan Estate, are fast being recognized as Toronto's finest event venue. Impeccable service, and inventive menus complement these impressive surroundings. Make your next wedding, bar mitzvah, anniversary or special event one of your dreams. Let our expert staff make your next celebration perfect. Call today.

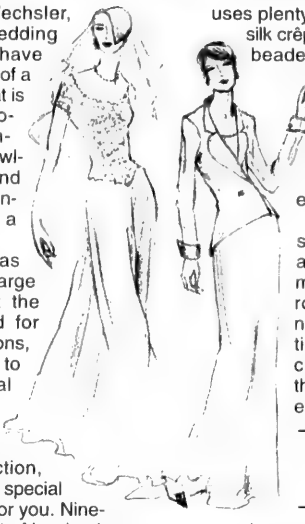
Adele Wechsler for elegant understatement

For Adele Wechsler, quality wedding garments have become symbolic of a 15-year career that is still gaining momentum. Combining extensive knowledge of fabric and design, loving attention to detail and a strong artistic sense, Adele has built a business large enough to meet the growing demand for her unique creations, yet small enough to keep the personal touch.



Rather than offer a bewilderingly huge selection, Adele creates that special gown that's right for you. Ninety percent of her business is custom; and all custom dresses are crafted in-house by a small, dedicated, and talented staff.

Individuality expressed

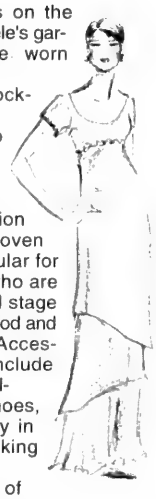
Adele's expanding collection focuses on special occasion and contemporary wedding wear. The woman who's confident in who she is and wants to express her individuality will find herself particularly well-served by the Wechsler approach, whether she's a first-time bride, second-time bride, or Mother of the Bride. Adele Wechsler satisfies this varied clientele with a look that is elegant, understated, and tailored to the individual. Ornament is used sparingly, to emphasize the basic design; and the favorite colors are the softer whites, ivory, champagne and blush tints.

Adele's ideas are gaining currency again. She has noticed a return to cleaner lines, Empire lines, short sleeves, and A-line or bias-cut skirts. Layered chiffon gowns and couture brocade jackets over silk sheath dresses are popular among her clients.

One of Adele's specialties is knit and fabric suiting combinations. She uses plenty of silks, brocades, silk crêpes and satins, pearl beaded chiffons, and layered ombre chiffons. Lace combinations, especially with French laces such as Chantilly, are another specialty.

The Adele Wechsler look is comfortable to wear and move around in, yet romantic and feminine. It's stylish yet timeless, with a charm that evokes the Bogie and Bacall era, or evening dresses on the Titanic. And Adele's garments can be worn many times, as evening and cocktail gowns.

Bat Mitzvah collection



There's also a bridesmaid collection, and a junior/bat mitzvah collection which has proven extremely popular for young ladies who are in a transitional stage between childhood and womanhood. Accessories include hats, headpieces, shoes, and jewelry in various striking designs.

The style of service is another plus. You take your time to make the right choices, and you receive as many fittings as you need. "Even if a decision is right," Adele acknowledges, "you're happier when you're not pressured into it."

"Boutique Hotel" offers many wedding benefits

Making sure that a wedding goes well involves hundreds of details. Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto will take care of them all under one roof, meaning less stress on the wedding party, and more enjoyment for everyone — bride, groom, family and friends.

Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto hosts wedding parties of 40 to 180 people, starting at $92.00 per guest, plus gratuity and taxes.

When you book your function at this marvelously mid-sized downtown hotel, which offers self parking after 6 p.m. for all guests of the bridal party, you'll find something special in store for both bride and groom.

The festivities begin at 6 p.m. with a one-hour cocktail reception featuring complimentary piano player, open bar and hot and cold hors d'oeuvres. This is followed by an elegant four-course dinner with imported wine, and sparkling wine afterwards for toasts. There is a four-hour host bar after dinner, and coffee and tea service at midnight.

Also, the bride and groom receive one free room on the wedding night for every $2,000 spent, to a maximum of five nights. For example, if there are 75 guests at $92 each, totalling $6,900, there would be three complimentary rooms for the bride and groom to offer family and friends. (These figures do not include taxes and gratuity.)

Rates start at $210 for a single or double room, with special rates during the slow season. When they arrive on their wedding night, the bride and groom receive a complimentary suite and chilled champagne. Before setting out next morning on their honeymoon, they are served a continental breakfast (sliced fruit, Danish pastry, croissants and coffee).

If you wish, Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto will be pleased to organize every aspect of your wedding within the domain of the hotel, from flowers to entertainment. The catering manager will attend to every detail to ensure all goes smoothly. This level of service is in keeping with Hotel Inter-Continental's profile: it's a "boutique hotel" for individual business travellers, families, intimates and small groups (and possibly a celebrity or two in search of privacy and quiet).

Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto is located at 220 Bloor Street West, just west of Avenue Road, across from the Royal Conservatory of Music. For more information, ask for the catering manager at (416) 324-5914.

At Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto, we make any simcha elegantly distinctive and respectfully traditional. Celebrate in one of our elegant reception rooms with up to 250 guests, or under the stars in our outdoor courtyard. And enjoy a special Mazel Tov gift – a complimentary overnight stay for every $2,000 you spend on Food & Beverage.

The Creative Approach to Bridal Registry

These days, most engaged couples register for gifts. It's a direct way to communicate your preferences. You may not have thought of this, however you can also register for original works of art!

A Show of Hands is a contemporary craft gallery offering truly exceptional one of a kind pieces from hand blown glass, to ceramics, magnificent Judaica to jewellery. They specialize in alternative registries and corporate gifts. What is an alternative registry? Gallery director Sara Levine-Petroff explains, "It's a wish list. It either augments a conventional registry, or is chosen in lieu of it. People register for many different reasons; engagements, housewarmings, birthdays, anniversaries, or bar and bat mitzvahs. Today, many couples are getting married after establishing their careers. They may already have the household basics such as cookware and dishes, and are looking for special pieces to accent their homes. Original, signed works that reflect their lifestyle."

When asked about the trend of today's choices in craft works, Sara notes, "It's a marriage between form and function. People are looking for functional craft pieces that can be used when entertaining. Many of the contemporary Judaic artworks such as menorahs and sedar plates are left on display all year round in our clients homes."

A Show of Hands has a truly inspired range of attendants' gifts, and can accommodate personalized commissioned works. Information on the artist is included with every signed piece. When registering, you are extended a 10% discount on all attendants' gifts.

After 14 years, A Show of Hands Contemporary Craft Gallery has become known as the choice destination for unique, inspirational gifts. If you have never been to the gallery, be sure to stop in before you consider registering anywhere.

Location: 1947 Avenue Road, at Felbrigg, 5 blocks south of Wilson. Gallery hours are 10:00 a.m.—6:00 p.m. Monday—Saturday.

Expert kosher affairs at the Sheraton Centre

For over 10 years, the Sheraton Centre Toronto Hotel has been the location of choice for hundreds of couples who want a luxurious alternative to a synagogue wedding.

"Many brides and grooms decide they want a traditional kosher wedding, but in a location other than a synagogue," says Carin Robertson, Director of Catering Sales for the Sheraton Centre Hotel. "The Sheraton Centre is an elegant, unique choice."

"Combine our dedicated kosher kitchen with our award-winning level of personal service, add your choice of renovated function rooms and top off with our ideal location in the heart of downtown Toronto, and you've got a recipe for success. We've been hosting kosher events ... weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs, cocktail parties, through to conventions, and gala evenings ... since 1985, for 20-200 people."

The Sheraton Centre Toronto has a completely separate kosher kitchen, complete with its own china and flatware, strictly supervised by the Kashruth Council of Toronto. "The Council's Mashgiach has keys to our kosher kitchen, and is present during all preparations and for each affair," says Robertson. "So, it's not necessary to kosher the regular kitchen each time."

Experienced and talented chefs offer creative and flexible menus to suit any taste. Both the kitchen and the serving staff are accustomed to kosher affairs, and can easily and professionally handle any concern their clients may have.

Executive Chef Heinz Wagner has been with the hotel since inception of the kosher cooking services. A past president of the Escoffier Club, an association of Toronto executive chefs, Wagner has been instrumental in creating exciting kosher cuisine in Toronto.

"We have complete facilities," comments Robertson, "to service a kosher wedding, including separate rooms for signing of the marriage contract, the ceremony, and the reception."

Indeed, and for those couples who request an outdoor Chupah, the Sheraton Centre Hotel has the perfect place: 2.5 acres of outdoor gardens, complete with waterfalls, right in the midst of the hotel. It is also a spectacular setting for portraits and family photographs!

"Whether your plans call for something formal, or more relaxed, our team of Catering experts will ensure your wedding day is picture-perfect," states Robertson.

Out-of-town guests will enjoy the Sheraton Centre's convenient location, connected to City Hall parking, steps from exciting shopping, theatre and sightseeing. Kosher meals are available through room service.

Personalized service, talented, experienced staff, your choice of facilities. An award-winning hotel with a dedicated kosher kitchen, located in the heart of downtown. No wonder the Sheraton Centre Toronto Hotel has been the alternative choice to synagogue weddings for over 10 years.

In the heart of Toronto, the Sheraton Centre is always ready for a kosher affair. Our dedicated kosher kitchen has been creating magnificent menus since 1985. Accomplished chefs and experienced serving staff take pride in handling every kosher affair with flawless expertise. Elegant facilities can easily accommodate 200 people...or 2,000. For more information, contact Carin Robertson, Director of Catering Sales, at (416) 947-4896.

One of the most important and lasting choices a couple will make is the selection of engagement and wedding rings. With such a wide array available it is sometimes difficult to select a store that will offer wide variety combined with the personalized service that is essential for such a timeless purchase. Over the last 15 years, Mark Lash Designs has been providing discriminating clientele with valued advice, prompt service and sales of quality jewelry, engagement and commitment rings, wedding bands and custom designed pieces to commemorate your most special occasions.

Our innovative team draws on a vast knowledge of precious metals and gems to create inspired one-of-a-kind designs and gifts. Our philosophy is that of personal service and education. Each customer's taste is individual and at Mark Lash Designs we assist you by giving you the attention and knowledge required to wisely make the most suitable choice based on your specific needs and budget. Because we are diamond merchants buying directly from the source overseas on a regular basis, handpicking each stone ourselves, we also have the resources to offer the best quality and selection at an affordable price. Ottawa school hit by arson

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Officials at Ecole Maimonides in suburban Ottawa are appealing to all of Canadian Jewry for help following the second arson attack in three years at the Orthodox Jewish day school.

As of The CJN's deadline, fire investigators were combing through the damage at the Nepean school after an attack at about 2 a.m. on Oct. 1 – just hours after Yom Kippur ended.

It was a chilling replay of a similar arson attack at the school in August 1995, after which the building's interior was entirely renovated.

The French immersion Torah day-school has an enrolment of about 100 students from preschool to Grade 8.

Ottawa-Carleton police say a preliminary investigation suggests a suspect or suspects forced open a window and entered a classroom, where papers were set ablaze. The fire then ignited a nearby couch.

The fire was quickly put out. But original damage estimates of $40,000 were boosted to between $65,000 and $75,000 because of smoke damage throughout the school.

Rabbi Yehoshua Botnick, the school's executive administrator, said damage was limited mainly to five classrooms in one wing. Two of the classrooms were "severely" damaged, he said.

The affected wing will be shut down and students will be relocated to elsewhere in the building, he added. The school was closed last Friday.

"The most unnerving thing is that there was a similar attack three years ago, which put us out of business for a month," the rabbi said in an interview.

No arrests were made as of last Friday.

The blaze "came as a deep shock to the community," said Mitchell Bellman, executive director of Ottawa's Jewish Community Council.

Bellman said that as far as he knows, the fire is not being considered as a hate crime.

Harris in Israel

TORONTO — Ontario Premier Mike Harris will make an official visit to Israel from Oct. 12 to 14 for meetings with government and other political officials.

A meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is scheduled. Harris will also meet with Ontario and Israeli business leaders.

A statement from the premier's office notes that more than half of Canada's trade with Israel involves Ontario companies. Israel is one of Ontario's largest trading partners in the Mideast, with two-way trade totalling $314 million last year.

This will be Harris' second visit to Israel. He visited in 1994 as leader of the PC party.

Woman Gets Nine Months

JERUSALEM — An Israeli woman has been sentenced to nine months in prison for failing to tell police about the plot to assassinate Yitzhak Rabin. Margalit Har-Shefi, who expressed remorse for her actions for the first time after the sentencing faced a two-year jail term.

Israel and the Bomb

JERUSALEM — Israel quickly developed nuclear weapons on the eve of the 1967 Six Day War, according to a new book. But as described in Israel and the Bomb, which examines Israel's nuclear development during the 1950s and 1960s, other Israeli officials rejected Shimon Peres' suggestion at the time that the Jewish state conduct a test in order to demonstrate its nuclear capability.

Mordechai Rejects Strike

JERUSALEM — Israeli Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai criticized a Knesset member's proposal that Israel should launch a preemptive strike against Iran. Labor party member Ephraim Sneh urged the strike following the recent display of the Shahab-3 ballistic missile in Tehran.

Firm Apologizes

SYDNEY — A leading Australian stock brokerage firm has publicly apologized and accepted resignations from two employees following revelations of anti-Semitism. The moves came after court transcripts revealed that employees of J.B. Were & Sons had made anti-Semitic comments regarding a Jewish-owned company.

Service Ruled Legal

SYDNEY — The Australian Anti-Discrimination Tribunal has ruled that a dating service catering exclusively to Jews does not violate the country's anti-discrimination laws.

Rightist Parties Fail

FRANKFURT — None of Germany's three leading far-right parties received enough votes to enter parliament. The Republicans, the German People's Union and the National Democrats each received less than two percent of the vote in the country's national elections that brought defeat to Chancellor Helmut Kohl. The leader of Germany's Jewish community, Ignatz Bubis, noted that a disproportionate number of younger voters had supported the right-wing parties.

Governor Sounds Off

MOSCOW — The governor of the southern Russian region of Krasnodar is again making waves with his anti-Semitic remarks. Nikolai Kondratenko was sued recently after calling the administration of the region's largest mayor a "Zionist nest" and a "Judeo-Masonic mafia."

Postpone Beatification

NEW YORK — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has asked Pope John Paul II to postpone the beatification of Alojzije Stepinac, the archbishop of Zagreb during World War II. For decades, historians have debated the role Stepinac played under the pro-Nazi fascist regime that ruled Croatia during the war.

Support for Crosses

WARSAW — Only 15 percent of Poles support the placing of new crosses outside the site of the Auschwitz death camp by radical Catholic militants, according to a new poll.

Shul Survives Hurricane Georges

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico — Shaare Zedeck Congregation purchased a back-up generator following last year's electrical blackout on Yom Kippur. One year later, that purchase came in handy: The generator allowed Shaare Zedeck, San Juan's largest shul, to hold services last week.

Like the rest of the island, the congregation, which serves the city's 1,800-member Jewish community, suffered the wrath of Hurricane Georges.

After services on Rosh Hashanah eve were held as scheduled, prayers the next morning were at 7 a.m. so that residents had time to go home and prepare for the storm.

The rescheduling was a good idea. By 2 p.m. that day, Georges hit the island, and the storm continued all day and into the night.

The next day's services were cancelled, the first time that Jewish residents of the U.S. territory can remember that happening.

"We consider ourselves really fortunate," said Rabbi Alfredo Winter, the synagogue's spiritual leader.

IRB response to remark 'insufficient': report

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An independent report into a Nazi salute given by the deputy chair of Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB), and how the IRB handled the resulting fallout, doesn't go far enough, says Canadian Jewish Congress.

CJC renewed its calls for a full and independent probe into allegations of bias, anti-Semitism and homophobia at the board, whose 200 or so government-appointed members determine who gets asylum in Canada.

Congress says in light of the report, it will press Citizenship and Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard for a complete and impartial inquiry into the work environment at the IRB.

The report by Ottawa lawyer David Scott, released last week, confirms that John Frecker uttered "sieg heil," accompanied by some form of salute, but adds the remark by the deputy chair "was neither racially motivated," nor "symptomatic of a racist environment" at the IRB.

Scott says Frecker's remark, made a year ago to two board members, was a "spontaneous, albeit misguided, attempt at humor." Frecker earlier explained that the remark was in response to a management tactic he considered heavy-handed.

The remark sparked a complaint almost a year later from board member Jeanette Goldman, a child survivor of the Holocaust. Despite a written apology to her from Frecker, she called his actions "indefensible."

Scott's report notes that the IRB's own investigation into the incident should have been handled differently.

It says IRB chair Nurjehan Mawani learned of the incident "within a matter of days" of its occurrence, but instead of acting, she opted to monitor the situation — a move Scott calls "insufficient."

"Nothing was done until Ms. Goldman complained," the report states, adding that Frecker's apology to Goldman, while "well-intentioned," was "unduly defensive."

Last week, Frecker issued a public apology "to anyone and everyone who has been offended by what I said. In particular, I am sorry for any pain my words have caused to anyone who may have taken my comment as trivializing Nazi atrocities in the Holocaust."

Frecker incident

Mawani announced that the IRB would implement the following "short term" follow-up actions: looking at ways to "enhance cross-cultural components of its personnel training program to place greater emphasis on sensitivity to intercultural issues;" and strengthening the existing framework for dealing with complaints.

But CJC president Moshe Ronen said Scott's report "was done in a vacuum" because it did not consider allegations of anti-Semitism and other forms of bias on the part of board members.

Mawani "is not properly carrying out her responsibilities. A cloud still hangs over the board," said Ronen.

Rochelle Wilner of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) said her organization is "very pleased" with Scott's report.

However, BBC also wants a thorough investigation into allegations of bias at the board, "which have not been addressed," Wilner said.

Michael Schelew, a Jewish former deputy chair of the IRB, said Mawani's "inaction" following Frecker's remarks shows she was "not concerned" about the trivialization of Nazism.

Schelew said he agrees with calls for an independent inquiry, not only into allegations of bias at the board, but also into how Mawani handled the Frecker incident.

Also last week, IRB member Lubomyr Luciuk, who had been accused of anti-Semitic statements, was not reappointed to the board.

Luciuk was the subject of a complaint by former board member Maureen Silcoff, now a lawyer in private practice in Toronto. Earlier this year, Silcoff herself failed to win reappointment to the board.

In a written complaint last month to Mawani, Silcoff accused Luciuk of inappropriate behavior and making anti-Semitic and anti-homosexual remarks. She also complained about two other board members, and about Frecker for allegedly interfering with a case.

Eric Tetrault, a spokesman for Robillard, told The CJN that Luciuk was not reappointed "because he failed to meet our criteria."

Ottawa to celebrate Israel's 50th

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Visitors from across the country are expected at a unique week-long celebration of Israel at 50, to be held at the National Arts Centre (NAC) in November.

A committee, co-chaired by Sara Vered and Dr. Norman Barwin, has worked with NAC staff to plan a wide array of events and activities to mark the occasion.

One of the week's highlights will be a lecture, on Nov. 17, by former prime minister Shimon Peres.

The new music director designate of the National Arts Centre orchestra, Pinchas Zukerman, will be conducting concerts on Nov. 18 and 19, and will be joined by his Israeli protege Ariel Shamai.

Throughout the week, the NAC will display art and photography, and science and technology exhibits. The L'Chaim stage will feature Israeli music and dance. Special activities for students are planned as well.

Funds raised at special events throughout the week will go towards funding the NAC orchestra tour of Israel in 2000.

Honorary co-chairs of Israel at 50 are David Sultan, ambassador of Israel to Canada, and Herb Gray, deputy prime minister. Honorary patrons are Senator E. Leo Kolber, Senator Jerry Grafstein and David Berger, Ambassador of Canada to Israel.

From the editor's desk

Judicial excellence

A small item appeared last month in The CJN (Sept. 24) reporting that Warren Soles had been sentenced to serve 10 months in jail, in addition to the eight months he had already spent in custody awaiting trial, for having desecrated 43 headstones last April in the B'Nai Israel cemetery of St. Catharines.

The incident shocked us.

We are unused to these things happening here. It is very rare indeed that we encounter such a vile act of callous, ignorant hatred.

The attack on 43 headstones was not an impetuous, random act. It was not an outburst on the spur of the moment, but rather planned and calculated. It took considerable determination, effort and time to walk from one tombstone to another, 43 times, in the sheltering darkness of night, wielding sledgehammer and crowbar.

It was craven and abhorrent.

Across my desk last week, I received from Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, a copy of the reasons given by Justice D.J. Taliano in imposing the 18-month sentence on Soles. Taliano ruled that Soles' behavior was motivated by racial hatred and as a result, a more severe penalty was warranted.

His judgment was an inspiring example of judicial excellence. Moreover, and most importantly, it succinctly yet elegantly expressed the uniqueness of the society that Canadians are trying to build. So insightful and so thoughtful were his reasons, I am reproducing brief excerpts so that the wider CJN public has an opportunity to read them.

"In the face of this overwhelming evidence, the protestation by Mr. Soles that he was unaware that the object of his wrath was a Jewish cemetery is neither credible, nor acceptable. And although he has apologized for his behavior, I am not satisfied that his apology is genuine, given the fact that he has not renounced the beliefs to which he adhered before his arrest. He merely denies that he holds them, and his denial is neither believable, nor under oath... Accordingly, for the purposes of this sentence, I must and do treat Mr. Soles as an ongoing threat to the Jewish community and other minority groups, and I must, therefore, tailor a sentence that will convey, not only to Mr. Soles, but to others that would emulate him, that the penalties are severe for this kind of malicious behavior.

"Canada is a pluralistic mosaic, a country that permits and even encourages its minorities to maintain their distinctive cultural identities. This policy was enshrined in Sec. 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights...

"The wilful persecution of a visible Canadian is the very antithesis of the essential values sought to be protected by Sec. 27 of the Charter because, in the words of Mr. Justice Cory in R. v. Andrews, "Multiculturalism cannot be preserved, let alone enhanced, if free rein is given to the promotion of hatred or violence against identifiable cultural groups.

"I am satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that this court is clearly and unmistakably dealing with a case of malevolence towards, and vilification of, a group of individuals based on racial, religious or ethnic differences. This court must strongly denounce such behavior, particularly when it becomes the role model for others. It is a particularly aggravating factor that survivors of the Holocaust and their offspring have been made to relive the horror of that period because of the senseless and hateful actions of you, Mr. Soles – a result that you intended to happen. The victims of this crime should be therefore reassured that the criminal laws of this country will be applied by the courts not only to comfort and protect them from this form of hurtful and criminal behavior but to deter others from like conduct. That is the very least that a free and democratic country can do for its minorities. (Our emphasis)

"[I]n my view, a sentence of eight months in prison is insufficient to reflect society's abhorrence of this type of hate crime, particularly when the offender has not shown true remorse and continues to be a threat to society. That being the case, I have concluded that a sentence of 18 months in prison is more appropriate...

"In addition, Mr. Soles, I place you on probation for a period of three years, upon the following terms:

1) you will keep the peace and be of good behavior,

2) you will have no association or contact with racist organizations of any kind, nor with people known to you to be a member of such organizations,

3) you will not possess weapons, explosive substances or ammunition for a period of five years from this date,

4) you will report to the probation office as often as required by the probation worker,

5) you will make restitution to the B'Nai Israel Cemetery in the sum of $4,004.47, which restitution is to be paid before the end of your period of probation,

6) you are to stay away from – that means not to be found within 100 metres of – any Jewish cemetery in St. Catharines or in any other community,

7) you will take whatever counselling program your probation officer may recommend with a view to addressing your racist and anti-social views of society.

"You have no reason to hate the Jewish community, none whatsoever. I am hoping that this time in custody will cause you to reflect upon your behavior, the grief that you have imposed on these people."

Police report rise in hate crimes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The number of hate-motivated crimes reported to police grew by 19 percent in the first half of 1998, according to a report released recently by the Toronto Police hate crime unit.

Ninety-two hate crime occurrences were reported to Toronto Police in the first six months of 1998, up from 77 events the year before. Thirty of the incidents involved assaults, while mischief (19), threats (18) and promotion of hatred (13) were next in order of frequency. In the six years since the hate crimes unit began compiling statistics, 604 occurrences have been recorded. The peak year was 1995 with 148 incidents.

Altogether, 16 arrests were made in the first six months of the year. Those cases are currently before the courts.

Blacks most victimized

The interim semi-annual report was prepared by the hate crimes unit of the police intelligence services and was submitted to the Police Services Board and to Chief David Boothby. It is not a comprehensive research document but a statistical survey to assist police in determining trends and patterns, explained Sgt. Dino Doria, spokesperson for the hate crimes unit. The unit's annual report will be published in January.

The report found that Jews were the most-often targeted religious group being victimized six times. That number was considerably fewer than the most targeted visible minority, blacks, who were victimized 21 times. Pakistanis and South Asians were next with 11 incidents reported.

Of the six anti-Jewish incidents, one, a telephone hate message, was traced to a paranoid-schizophrenic who will likely not be charged while another incident, involving promotion of hatred, was found by police to fall short of the standard that would lead to criminal charges.

The 19 percent statistical jump in the first half of the year may not represent an actual rise in the number of occurrences, Doria suggested. "I don't think we should look at it entirely as a negative thing," he said. "If we have people reporting these things, the statistics will go up."

Doria said the public is becoming increasingly comfortable reporting hate-motivated crime to the police and officers in the field have been trained to recognize when hate motivates an incident. Each police division headquarters has a liaison officer who forwards reports of hate crimes to the intelligence division, which monitors the activities of hate groups. Those factors could account for the jump in statistics in early 1998, he suggested.

Karen Mock, national director of the B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, agreed with Doria's assessment, adding that in recent years the League has held seminars for police about hate-motivated crimes to sensitize them to the impact they have on victims.

"At first glance, the trends they are showing, especially the rise in wilful promotion of hatred, are consistent with the trends we are seeing," she said.

"The report is an excellent barometer of what's going on. We get to view the bigger picture," said Keith Landy, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region. He suggested that despite the rising numbers cited in the report, incidents of hate-motivated crimes are under-reported.

"The majority of the hate crime occurrences appeared to be spontaneous attacks by suspects with no affiliation to hate organizations," the police document stated. "Suspects came from varied ethnic and religious backgrounds with no one particular community groups being identified as responsible. Visual differences and stereotypical negative views can be considered primary reasons for acts of violence."

Four organized groups – the Heritage Front, Aryan Blitzkrieg, the Ku Klux Klan and White Aryan Resistance (WAR) – were identified in the report, but only four occurrences were linked to them. The Klan and WAR circulated posters and signs, the Heritage Front was tied to a threatening phone call and Aryan Blitzkrieg members were involved in an assault using mace and broken bottles, the report stated.

Despite the low number of occurrences attributed to hate groups, they are active behind the scenes, especially on the Internet, the report continued. At one time, hate groups recruited young members though rallies, distribution of flyers and meetings. Now they operate through "cyberspace networking... Through the Internet, numerous Toronto based [Web] sites have been created with the objective to disseminate hate propaganda and anti-immigration and multiculturalism policies using the pretense of freedom of speech... Their true goal is to recruit new, young 'foot soldiers'/skinheads while spreading their hateful rhetoric."

Torah fair celebrates arrival of two new scrolls

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN

MARKHAM — Hundreds of synagogue and community members turned out for Chabad Lubavitch of Markham's Torah fair, held to celebrate the recent donation of two new Torahs.

"The unique fact that two Torahs have been donated in recent months is a cause to celebrate," says Rebbitzen Goldie Plotkin, wife of Rabbi Avraham Plotkin.

The first Torah was donated about two months ago by Holocaust survivors Morris and Ifa Demon. The most recent Torah, which was completed at the fair, was donated by nine families in the congregation, including Stanley and Janet Dogon, Jonathan and Danielle Jacobson, Saul and Deborah Levy, Michael and Suzanne Metz, Saul and Robyn Quint, Leslie and Ilana Sarak, Brian and Jenny Schwartz, Richard and Carol Steyn and Larry and Beryl Weltman.

After the synagogue's Torahs were brought out to meet the most recent Torah, which was marched in under a chupah accompanied by members who sang and clapped, the marchers entered the synagogue, which was built on Green Lane in Markham about a year and a half ago.

The fair included a demonstration by Torah scribe, Rabbi Shmuel Zirkind; a Torah workshop where participants could write their Hebrew name using a quill, ink and parchment; and a kiddie corner where children made edible Torahs out of cookies, icing and candy and colored a souvenir Torah.

"This was a special celebration and we wanted to celebrate in a way that was both fun and educational," said Rebbitzen Plotkin.

Rabbi Plotkin said that amongst Judaism's many symbols, "none is more enduring, encompassing and powerful as the Torah itself...The Torah which we complete today, with God's help, is one more in that glorious chain of Torahs."

Sons of Jacob to celebrate 80th anniversary

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Sons of Jacob Shalom Lodge will celebrate its 80th anniversary on Oct 18 with a dinner dance at the Lodzer Centre on Heaton Street.

Sons of Jacob, a benevolent society, was founded in 1919 by a "handful of young and enthusiastic members who felt that Toronto needed an organization to help in the building of a strong and healthy future for the Jewish community," Simon Elbaum, president and a co-organizer of the banquet, told The CJN.

Originally called the Sons of Jacob Benevolent Society, the name was changed some 20 years ago to modernize it and attract younger members, he said.

Calling himself the only "greener" in the organization, Elbaum, who immigrated to Canada in 1948, said he was encouraged to join the society in 1952 by the late Leslie Zack, his landlord on Bellevue Avenue in the Kensington Market. In those days the meetings were held at the Borochov Centre's downtown location.

Meetings still take place at the Borochov Centre, which is now located on Codsell Avenue in Downsview. The monthly general breakfast meeting, is held on the first Sunday of the month at 10:00 a.m.

He said that the lodge has always been active in fundraising for Jewish causes, and their efforts are now directed at a number of local and Israeli organizations, among them, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Mount Sinai Hospital, Holocaust programs and The Shaare Zedek Medical Centre in Jerusalem.

Elbaum said that members also volunteer at several organizations including the Hebrew Club for the Blind and Kadima School. He said that when members were younger and in better health, they were able to drive visually impaired people to meetings and appointments, and they still organize outings for the students from Kadima.

There are some 100 members, but at one time the membership was more than 300 strong. While they no longer run major fundraisers, members still get together for a weekly night of bowling and socializing.

The Sons of Jacob's women's auxiliary, called the Young Womens' branch of the Sons of Jacob, was established in 1951 and is still active in fundraising. Initially, it was made up of the wives of the members of Sons of Jacob, but the membership is open to anyone who is interested, Elbaum said.

The monthly meetings, which take place the first Tuesday evening of the month, are held on a rotating basis in a member's home.

Other organizers and executive members of the Sons of Jacob include secretary Harry Banikin and vice-president Harvey Kosloff.

The banquet and bowling league is open to anyone in the community, and new members are always welcome to the lodge, Elbaum said. He can be contacted at 781-5754.

As foreign fires rage

One can plausibly make a case these days for seeing parallels with an ancient Rome that burned while a distracted and demented Emperor Nero preferred to make silly music.

Fires are raging throughout the world. In some cases embers are being stoked afresh; in other cases, smoldering brush is being set to the wind. But Washington fiddles, caught up in the twisted strings and sybaritic discord of sex, scandal and political scheming.

• Kosovo. The lead paragraph of the story said it all. "The bodies of 15 women, children and elderly members of the Delaj clan lay slumped among the rocks and streams of the gorge below their village in Kosovo province...shot in the head at close range and in some cases mutilated, as they tried to escape advancing Serbian forces." In the course of one day last week, 34 people were cut down like unwanted chaff by the forces of Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic. He is prosecuting a war of terror against ethnic Albanians in Kosovo province who are seeking their independence from him. What is unfolding there has been described by international observers as a humanitarian catastrophe.

• Hebron. A Palestinian threw two hand grenades into the heart of the market of this tense, divided city wounding 24 people – 13 Israelis and 11 Palestinians. Like his terror-driven colleagues, this murderous man is more intent on destroying than on building, on seeing blood flow rather than rivers of prosperity.

• Iraq. Emboldened by the biteless bark of the UN, Saddam Hussein invigorates his defiance of the Security Council's desire to resume spot arms inspections. Moreover, as he scoffs at the U.S.-led alliance, he demands that sanctions against his country be lifted. One expert comments that Iraq is "just one Russian smuggler away from being able to build a nuclear bomb with illegally obtained material."

• Sri Lanka. More than 1,300 government troops and Tamil rebels were killed in fierce fighting in the last week of September. No one knows for certain, but it is estimated that more than 54,000 people have been killed since 1984 in the struggle by minority Tamils for a separate homeland from the Sinhalese majority.

• India and Pakistan. Both countries pledged recently to sign the comprehensive (nuclear) test ban treaty; however, the details of their acceptance of the treaty discipline have not yet been worked out.

• Munich. U.S. federal prosecutors are seeking the extradition of Mamdouh Mahmud Salim, being held by German officials. Salim has been charged with conspiring to attack U.S. military sites. He was described as a "senior deputy" to Osama bin Laden, the Saudi exile suspected of planning and underwriting a string of terrorist actions, including the August bombings in Kenya and Tanzania. The conspiracy dates to 1992, and covers an ambitious campaign of terror and intended murder.

The preceding was not an exhaustive list of global "hotspots." It was merely the result of one day's reading of the newspaper. Nor was the list compiled to instil a sense of alarm in readers. Rather it was compiled to instil a sense of resolve. We must not sit idly by while foreign "fires" rage. We must demand that the government of Canada take steps to deal with at least the humanitarian problems in a manner commensurate, not only with our military, economic and diplomatic standing in the world, but also and perhaps more to the point, with our moral standing which, we have long believed to be the source of our suasion. In the world of 1998, "foreign" fires soon become local ones.

I recently had the pleasure of spending a week in glorious Paris, France. One afternoon, a friend and I decided to visit the Montparnasse cemetery to view the headstones of the rich and famous. We were each given a slick glossy printed brochure of the who's who, and among the many names, which included both the Jewish painter Chaim Soutine and singer Serge Gainsbourg, I noticed Captain Alfred Dreyfus.

After great difficulty trying to locate his grave we asked a groundskeeper to help us. With a quick swoosh of his hand the groundskeeper knocked a variety of little stones off the tombstone. Horrified, I told my friend, "please explain to him that he shouldn't do that." A brief conversation ensued and she was told that so many stones were left on the grave that if they weren't occasionally knocked off people wouldn't be able to read the name on the tombstone. As I read the inscription, I couldn't help but notice an added inscription: A La Mèmoire de Madeleine Levy, Deportee par les Allemands, Disparue a Auschwitz A L'age de 25 ans.

I was immediately touched by the ironies of life. Alfred Dreyfus who suffered such indignities from anti-Semitism in the late 1800's lost a loved one in Auschwitz years later. I wondered who she was, a granddaughter perhaps?

Pattison's $1 million gift honored Arthur Fouks

In response to your article acknowledging the departure of Jewish National Fund's (JNF) British Columbia shaliach, "JNF shaliach heads home" (CJN, Aug. 13), I would like to set the record straight about the origins of the $1-million donation from Vancouver businessman Jimmy Pattison.

Pattison's gift of $1 million was made to the Endowment Fund of Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver in honor of Mr. Arthur Fouks, for whom a tribute dinner was held in November 1994. It was not until the following year that Itzchak Fuchs arrived in Vancouver to serve as JNF shaliach, long after the gift had been made.

Arthur Fouks has long been an outstanding leader of the Jewish community of Greater Vancouver, and a supporter of a remarkable number of organizations and causes locally, nationally and internationally. Pattison's gift was a result of his close friendship with and high regard for Fouks, and their shared interest in philanthropic endeavors both in Vancouver and in Israel. Credit for the generous gift to the Jewish community should be given where it is deserved.

Chafes at delay in Canadian restitution process

The other day, I saw an application form to be used by permanent U.S. residents for claims of Swiss restitution funds.

I called Canadian Jewish Congress to find out about a similar form to be used by Canadian residents, and I was told that Canada is not ready yet.

When will Congress be ready to receive Canadian claim applications?

Both Israelis and Palestinians die for peace

I found "Israeli-Palestinian Peace: A Five Year Chronology" (CJN, Sept. 17) very concise and informative. However, the author failed to list many events in which Israelis killed Palestinians. Many Israelis and Palestinians have sacrificed their lives to the process and they should both be acknowledged. Hopefully, in the new year, both sides will make concessions, and neither will have to suffer any more losses.

Auschwitz Catholic survivor against more crosses

I am a 76-year-old eyewitness who was imprisoned in Auschwitz from 1940 till the end of 1944, prisoner number 88. I concur with the Jewish survivors that no religious signs should be permitted in this notorious Nazi camp where 1,500,000 Jews were killed, also 80,000 Polish Catholics and a number of others.

This year, a modern day crusade against "the perfidious Jews" as our Catholic liturgy used to call them, went into a high gear after a widely published Polish press report of Cardinal Glemp's statement that the 40-foot cross under which the Pope prayed during his 1979 visit will remain forever on the Auschwitz grounds.

Recently, more than 80 crosses of different sizes were placed by the so-called society of "Defenders of the Cross" to prevent Jews and Masons from stealing this Papal cross.

I am proud of my Polish Catholic heritage but I feel ashamed and disgusted that neither the Catholic church nor the government of Poland seem to have any solution nor political will to end this holy horror of disrespectful sanctimony.

Women, prayer and spiritual needs

By BARBARA RAUBFOGEL

"...And if women wish to pray three times each day, they are worthy of blessing, and it is appropriate that they so do when time allows...since the one who prays seeks compassion, and our rabbis have taught us... would that people pray the entire day.

— Rabbi Ovadiah Yoseph

Ever since Hannah, mother of the prophet Samuel, prayed her silent prayer and became a role model for future generations, women have sought to express their spiritual needs. Women express their commitment to Judaism and Torah through formal prayer, and indeed, according to one midrash, it is from Hannah's prayer that we derive that women are obligated to pray.

Women's obligation to pray, however, has been differently defined by various rabbinical authorities ever since the rules regarding formal prayer were first instituted. As a result, women have believed that their role in formal prayer was at best secondary. Although women were not precluded from the obligation to pray according to Jewish law, the majority of Jewish women, who remained in the home for most of their lives, had little if any formal education and could not understand the formal prayers.

In the 17th century, Tchines, a genre of "women's" prayers first appeared. The tchines were written in Yiddish, the spoken language; they could be recited in the home, at any time. Because these devotional prayers were less formal in form and content, they appealed to women in the Ashkenazi communities of Europe. The tchines recognized that women had intellectual needs, as well as material ones. For three centuries, European women gave voice to their devotional acts and petitioned for their needs in hundreds of tchines.

Tchine writers recognized the distinctions between spontaneous and formal prayer: Whereas tfillah in the synagogue is structured, spontaneous prayer flows from the inner recesses of the human spirit. When a petitioner expresses his or her innermost needs and emotions, there are no rules or obligations. Although formal prayer and performing mitzvot are the most acknowledged expressions of Jewish piety, there are many areas of ritual activity which tend to blur the distinctions between the formal and the informal, law and custom. These are essential to Jewish life but are not obligatory. In these areas, Jewish women are the ritual experts.

Sociologist Susan Starr Sered studied how a group of women conduct their religious lives. The elderly women from Iraq, Yemen and Turkey have lived in Jerusalem for many years. The women identify a number of sacred spaces besides the synagogue, where holiness exists in an ascending order: the kitchen of one's home, the senior citizens centre, cemeteries and holy tombs (including the Western Wall). The public spaces are perceived as holier than the domestic ones. Prayers recited at synagogue and at tombs are more effective than prayers said at home.

When they were younger, due to family commitments, these women could rarely leave their houses. During most of their lives, they did not attend synagogue. For their husbands, holidays are associated with special prayers in the synagogue, whereas for them, holiday celebrations are focused in the kitchen. The men do not relate to the kitchen as a holy space. The women however, see in the preparation of special foods an essentially sacred activity.

Sered insists that these women do not reduce the observances, meanings and symbolism of each holiday to food; yet for them, food preparation is the most important ritual activity that they, as women, can perform. For this activity they do not have to consult rabbis – they see themselves as ritual experts in the area of kashrut. Cooking and serving ritual meals (seudot mitzvah) is a holy act. Since meals please God, they are seen as a type of worship.

Sered's study focuses on how the women perceive their religious acts – the notion of zchut (merit) is important to understanding the religious lives of these women. Anything that is "Jewish" is pleasing to God and is a potential source of zchut. These women do not differentiate between Halachah and minhag (custom). The fact that Jewish law does not require women to attend synagogue does not affect the merit that a woman receives for attending.

Also, a woman does not need to be able to read the Torah in order to receive zchut. Most of these women are illiterate. Caring and helping are the essence of religion for them. But the women have learned some prayers, and they now sit in the balcony of the synagogue. Because the women are proud and satisfied with their limited new-found knowledge, Sered questions the advantages of their moving from "the centre of the sidelines to the sidelines of the centre."

If this situation is to their disadvantage, it would not occur to them. They see themselves as performing an essential service – traditional Shabbat and holiday foods tie their children and their grandchildren to Judaism at a time when other links have been abandoned. The merit their acts earn guards their children, and the non-halachic, non-literate traditions they transmit guarantee that old country values will not die out.

Old age, and specifically widowhood, allow them extra time to spend at public holy places. Sephardi women have traditionally cared for the graves of their ancestors, and as a result, feel that they have the right to intercede with God on behalf of their living descendants. The actions and beliefs of these elderly Oriental women are by no means unique to their situation or time. Seeing to their family's needs in this world and in the world to come was a religious act that many European women of the 19th century would have claimed as their own.

The important point is that certain acts and observances were considered a woman's domain. Whether she belonged to a chassidic dynasty or was a city woman of Berlin, her life revolved around the family and the home. At the end of the 19th century, the home took on a new religious significance: In those homes where public traditional observances had been discarded for the most part, Jewish women (in many cases) continued to conduct their private religious observances.

Marion Kaplan, who has written extensively on the day-to-day lives of Jewish women, explains that this lag was due to the fact that their private world was more timed than the men's to childbirth, anniversaries and deaths. The women practised private rituals that ran parallel to the ceremonies in the synagogue. Kaplan notes that even in the most secular homes, a woman was loath to give up those acts and observances that afforded her a measure of social power she could find nowhere else.

In Israel, 16 well-known haredi women have been operating a pirate radio station in Jerusalem for the last year. Although their audience is mostly women from the observant Jerusalem community, they claim secular listeners as well. In a short time, they have attracted thousands of loyal listeners, and have upset the status quo.

The former Sephardi chief rabbi, Rabbi Ovadiah Yoseph, felt compelled to reassure their spouses that although a radio is inherently dangerous, and tameh (unclean), radio station

These women know little and care less about technology, and their Hebrew speaking skills are limited. They understand that they provide an essential service in their community. A popular hostess, the Rebbitzen Leah Kook explains: "Personally, we cannot reach everyone, and the women themselves cannot go to lectures or attend Torah classes. Today the haredi women sit at home, peel potatoes, feed their infants, turn on the holy station, and their kitchens become like synagogues."

Radio 107.1 sticks to a winning format: an informal combination of moral lessons, examples of ideal behavior, the weekly Torah portion and marital advice. Its mandate is to preserve and promote a modest lifestyle. Although one announcer mused whimsically that her husband would prefer her to remain at home, the advice she dispenses to her listeners is conservative in the extreme. Yet she is part of a quiet revolution in the haredi women's community. In a rapidly advancing technological age, observant Jews were gaining access to all sorts of appliances, including radios.

At the outset, the station was a male bastion. Rabbis identified their target audience – men and women who usually stumbled upon a son's hidden radio and listened in secret. Since they already had radios, why not make them kosher, the rabbis reasoned. Within a few weeks of operation, it was noted that women made up 90 percent of the audience. Women were calling the rabbis for advice, and their wives asked to take over. However, modest behavior precluded women's speaking out.

Then Rabbi Yoseph was consulted. Not only did he allow the station, he gave his blessing and a psak Halachah (a special dispensation) that the women could speak (but not sing – as women, their voices are a source of temptation). The radio manager brought in his wife, she brought in her friends, and within a week, the men were out.

At first some rabbis were appalled; a man might stumble upon the station, hear the voice of a woman and transgress the laws of modesty. As soon as it became apparent that the women wanted their radio regardless of their husbands' apprehension, however, an accommodation was made. While most concessions to modernity are not allowed, the women's station serves a higher purpose. On the station wall is a huge sign which reads: "Did you buy a new radio [to hear] the holy station?" The sign suggests that a woman who buys a radio earns zchut for her ancestors and helps redeem the world.

In this traditional community, the different religious obligations for men and women are clearly defined. Throughout history, perhaps because women were excused or excluded from performing most time-bound mitzvot, a religious pattern emerged that appears to be connected to a female sub-culture. In this subculture, interpersonal relationships and mutual aid are highly valued. This "female" activity is an avenue of spirituality, which women value, and it enriches their lives.

Women cannot be credited single-handedly for Judaism's staying power through the ages, although the fact that women may be more resilient to the forces of change, may have been a determining factor. In their role as mediators between family and society, women generally choose to emphasize traditions in which they play an active part. For traditionally observant women and men, Judaism intrudes into every area of secular activity making it "holy." Judaism is also defined as "law," and that law's endurance is affirmed by how challenging values are met and dealt with. Women reinforce the law with their observances, and they play an active role in cushioning the impact of change. Nowhere is this more apparent than in Israel today.

A nostalgia for mother's food and its connection with Shabbat and holidays almost defines these occasions for modern secular Israelis. Even the most secular Israelis recite blessings over the Shabbat candles and challah. This emerging Israeli culture is strongly influenced by the Jewish religion, as well as by the traditional values of Jews originating from Muslim countries. On an ideological level, Israeli women esteem food preparation as a paradigmatic women's religious activity. What defines holiness here is nurturing, and self-esteem resulting from, among other things, having a healthy, happy family.

Whereas these women have taken large steps into the public sphere, the seniors and the radio women have chosen to take smaller steps. Both are finding fulfilment.

Halifax – a kind of home

Three room-mates and two cats lounge on beat-up sofas, watching TV. Dishes for four dinners are clean and waiting to be put away. Outside, the rain is about to break free from the clouds. A quiet Halifax evening at home.

By Jennifer Fox in Halifax

Routines are in place now that a month of school has passed. I can sleep in till mid-morning every day except Thursday, when I have to drag myself out of bed and head off to the journalism school. Friday is designated as grocery shopping day; Sunday is perfect for studying since all the stores are closed.

Halifax feels familiar. Buses regularly pass my house and I know where they're headed. I can get around the Dalhousie campus without being late for my classes. I recognize faces at the synagogue where I attended High Holy Day services, and I know some names to go with the faces. People wish me Shanah Tovah and good Shabbat and ask how I'm finding school. School is fine, thank you for asking.

My room-mates have also adjusted to patterns. There are three shelves of dishes in our house. One for milk dishes, one for meat dishes and one for my room-mates' dishes, which are used for either of the above. I wanted to explain to them the correct use of the milk and meat dishes. I imagined a long drawn-out discussion on why fish was considered dairy, and where neutral foods such as pasta and vegetables go but the problem was resolved before I said anything. Two of them were now vegetarians, and the third didn't want to mix anything up so she only uses the other dishes.

High Holy Days approached and my family was hours away, but I knew what to do. I asked the Atlantic Jewish Council to place me with a family for Rosh Hashanah. Turkey, kugel, chalah, and apples and honey sat on a dinner plate before me. Instead of going home to pasta and sauce from a can, I was saved from a mundane meal by a generous family who fed me and two other "displaced" students. As part of the Halifax Jewish community, I was welcomed into their home.

The King's College community looks the same as last year. Eager first-year students sit on the warm grass of the King's quad with works by Homer and Plato in their hands. I walk by them and smile to myself. In the next seven months, their lives will be altered, but they don't realize it yet. I hope that last year, some upper-year student saw me scribbling notes in my copy of The Odyssey and smiled, knowing what was ahead.

There has been a small change in the picturesque quad. Approximately 30 Jewish students attend King's – four percent of the student population. This year, the student day-planner has Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur marked in the calendar, and Chanukah is on the right day; last year, it was three weeks off. Even the president of the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Student Federation is a King's student and the first event will be held on our campus. Maybe I can become adviser to some lost Jewish Foundation Year student so that she won't feel as isolated as I did.

The cats are now asleep and the television has been turned off for the night. Tomorrow, I will once again walk to the King's and Dalhousie campuses. I will sit through classes, take some notes, put on my rain jacket and lug my backpack home. Home, because that's what Halifax is – a kind of home.

Finding that happy medium

I woke up the other morning, called my friend and told him, "I want to buy a brick."

"You want to buy a what?" he said, as though he were talking to some woman calling his house in the middle of the night looking for a chimney sweeper.

By Erica Horn in Montreal

"A brick. It costs only $300," I answered.

"What is it, a golden brick?" At 11 a.m. his critical edge was kicking in.

"It's great. You pay $299 and you get your name engraved on a brick of Labatt Park, along with numerous tickets to see the Expos play in both the Big O and the new ball park. And it's a risk-free investment, because, if they don't build it, then you get all your money refunded."

There was dead silence.

"If I go half-half with you, do you think we could get both our names on the brick, and maybe even our Hebrew names included?" he asked.

What did he think this was, an inscription in the Book of Life? I disregarded the second part of his question and asked, "So, are you going to synagogue tomorrow morning, or are you going to sit home glued to CNN?"

Once again, he was willing to go half way and told me he would do a bit of both.

I am embarrassed to tell you what I did on the first morning of Rosh Hashanah, and it is unrelated to my food intake, which never seems to cease during the holidays. I am not certain whether I should be more ashamed of the fact that I was watching TV or of what I was watching. Make no mistake, I went to synagogue – because I wanted to go. Then, I went home and watched Clinton.

At shul, I overheard people telling their friends how surprised they were at the turnout. One lady in a big hat, which surely no one sitting behind her could see over, whispered, "It's amazing. When people woke up this morning, they decided to come pray, when they could be sitting home, watching Clinton."

My answer: People realized they could do both. They could make their appearance in shul, and then run for possession of the remote control. I really don't think the details of Clinton's relationship with Monica Lewinsky are any of the public's business, but there was this overwhelming sense of curiosity. If it's being shown, let me see it.

My analysis: With all that Clinton seemed to forget during his testimony to the grand jury, it surprises me that he remembers he is president in the morning!

I didn't agree with the rabbis who made appearances on TV, claiming that it was wrong for the tape of the testimony to be aired on Rosh Hashanah. I think it is chutzpah for Jews to assume that the world should come to a halt for us to celebrate our New Year. I do believe, however, that we deserve respect, as do other religions. It was considerate of municipalities to be lenient with parking around synagogues, thus making them more accessible to those who might otherwise not be able to attend. And it was considerate of some of my professors to say that failure to attend class on the holidays would not be penalized by a deduction of grades.

One of the hardest things these days is to be able to find a happy medium between religion and secular daily life. It is important for us to be aware of the world that surrounds us. It is also important for us to respect others, if in turn, we expect to be respected. As the saying goes, "different strokes for different folks." Religion makes guest appearances in different parts of different people's lives.

So, do you want to buy a brick? I am sure we can arrange to have your Hebrew name engraved on it too!

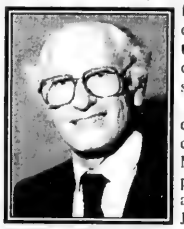
The poverty of affluence

The turmoil on the world's stock exchanges is often attributed to a fallout from the "Asian Crisis." It all started in Japan, so the analysts say, and it is therefore of some interest to look behind the scenes and find out why this should be so.



By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Here are some excerpts from an essay by Prof. Mark R. Mullins, published in a Japanese magazine. Japan, says the author, was sometimes lauded as number 1 for its postwar success: the economy was growing; there were stable families and a lower divorce rate; and the country prided itself on a splendid educational system that produced a steady stream of loyal and informed workers.

Says Mullins, who teaches in Japan: "Now the economy is in disarray, and we are beginning to realize that the postwar modernization process was achieved at considerable human cost. Many families had to sacrifice normal relationships and healthy communications between parents and children, as the primary breadwinner departed each day for excessively long work hours or even relocated to another city and lived alone.

"The absentee-father syndrome is only one example of the negative impact of government and business policies aimed at rapid economic development. Today Japan Inc. sits on an abundance of things, information and technology, but very little thought has been given to the basic moral question of what kind of society should be created with these rich resources. In short, the moral development of Japanese society has not kept pace with its economic development.

"Each day we are bombarded by the news media with reports by various government agencies on widespread social problems that reflect a fundamental moral deficiency in young people: a steady increase in the number of children refusing to attend school, the problem of buying in schools across Japan, the increase in suicides by children who see no other way out, the number of teenage girls engaging in prostitution with older men, and the increase in the number of students buying and carrying knives. These are clearly not isolated problems but reflect a wider breakdown in social order and morality."

The author makes the point that the same problems have surfaced in Japan as in North America, because of a decline in moral education. Schools are supposed to do what parents have neglected to accomplish: to instil in their children a firm sense of right and wrong and the understanding that success is not dependent on some vague environmental influence called "affluence."

Susumu Shimazono, a professor of religious studies at the University of Tokyo, recently put it well: "Until we find a genuine response to the dilemma of modernity and the crises of contemporary civilization, we will lack an effective basis to counter the destructive side of freedom. And can we ever find such a way without religion?"

What goes on in Japan goes on here as well. We Jews have a long tradition of teaching moral values and religion in the home, and that responsibility has very little to do with economic fluctuations and must never give way to a "poverty of affluence."

The Kirshner File

Polish shtetl commemorated in memorial book

By Sheldon Kirshner

Memorial books, compiled by Holocaust survivors to commemorate destroyed Jewish communities in Eastern Europe, are usually published in Yiddish. This is perfectly understandable, Yiddish having been the lingua franca of the majority of Jews there before World War II. But this very fact, regrettably, makes Yizkor books all but inaccessible to readers without a sound knowledge of Yiddish.

The survivors of Luboml, a shtetl in Poland close to the old Soviet border, have solved that problem. Keenly cognizant of the responsibility of passing on their heritage to postwar generations, they have translated their memorial volume into English.

The result, Luboml: The Memorial Book of a Vanished Shtetl (Ktav Publishing House), is a remarkable achievement. Composed of deeply-felt essays, evocative photographs and instructive maps, and infused with equal parts of nostalgia and grief, it is a window into a lost world.

Luboml (Libivne in Yiddish), one of the oldest Jewish communities in Poland, was settled by Jews in the 12th century. The Jews were devastated by the Chmielnicki hordes in 1648 and 1649, but they rebounded and prospered. By the 18th century, Luboml was the best-established Jewish community in the entire Chelm-Belz region.

Austrian troops occupied Luboml during World War I, and in the two decades prior to World War II, there was a great Jewish cultural and social renaissance there.

With the 1939 German invasion of Poland, chaos and tragedy ensued. Armed Ukrainian bands ran wild, robbing Jewish homes and stores. Then Polish gangs went on a killing spree, murdering a dozen Jews.

The Germans marched in for a brief period, leaving Luboml to the Red Army, according to the terms of Germany's non-aggression pact with the Soviet Union. With the German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, the end drew near. The Nazis oppressed, persecuted and, finally, shot the 12,000 Jews of Luboml and surrounding villages. Only a handful of Jews survived the murderous rampage. With one crushing blow, six centuries of Jewish history were wiped out.

Traditionally, the Jews of Luboml were craftsmen or small businessmen. Few were wealthy. The rich, known as gvirim, were not well liked, being regarded as exploiters.

Until the last years of the 1930s, the economy was mainly in the hands of Jews. But with the encouragement of the Polish government, which was not favorably disposed toward Jews, marketing cooperatives were established for the benefit of the Christian population. These cooperatives, and the heavy taxes levied on Jewish craftsmen and entrepreneurs, had the desired effect.

As might be expected in a society bound by tradition, virtually all of Luboml's Jews were religious. On the eve of the Sabbath, the men could be found in bathhouses, and the women at home, cooking and cleaning. On the Sabbath, the synagogues were full.

Secular books, referred to as "unkosher" by the pious, were fairly rare, and those who read them did so in private. But in the 1920s, secular texts in Yiddish, Hebrew and Russian became more available, and under their impact, some men began to trim their beards and earlocks.

Luboml itself was susceptible to change. Electrical street lighting, for instance, was introduced in 1925. Yet the market adjacent to the main shul never ceased being the heart and soul of Luboml.

Every shtetl had its "characters," the folks-mentschen, and Luboml was no different. Elye Kepke, the porter, was a coarse person, but he possessed a kind heart, and was the first to help a Jew in need. Chaymike, the water carrier, was illiterate, and let his customers tally up the cost of his labor.

Disaster came to Luboml on Sept. 1, 1939, when a column of German tanks and halftracks suddenly appeared. "Instinctively, every Jew was filled with terror," writes Yisroel Leichter, "but the behavior of the Germans was a great puzzle to us. They behaved entirely correctly towards the Jews."

With the German withdrawal, the Soviets poured in. The new rulers closed all Jewish institutions, banned charitable activities and desecrated the old Jewish cemetery.

When the Germans returned, they revealed their true colors. On Oct. 1, 1942, after robbing the Jews and herding them into a ghetto, they shot them en masse with the assistance of Ukrainian, Polish and Lithuanian collaborators.

Of those who escaped, only about 30 succeeded in hiding and remaining alive. Among them were 10 children between the ages of 10 and 12. They were raised as Catholics, and after the war, they chose to remain with the Christian families who had saved their lives. Apart from the survivors who no longer reside in Poland, they, ironically, are the last living "Jewish" links to Luboml.

Oct. 5, 1973, Jaffa: Cancellation calls were coming in, and suddenly, my farewell party had to be postponed. All the men – reservists in the Israeli army – had been unexpectedly ordered to report to their units. Something ominous was brewing on that Friday night. My wife Etti and I went downstairs for a walk. Excitement and anxiety filled the air. All able-bodied males were being called up.

Oct. 6: Early on Yom Kippur morning, we heard the roar of jets overhead. By 10 o'clock, the roads were already clogged with military vehicles. What was going on? At 2 p.m., we turned on the radio to listen to the news. In sombre tones, the announcer disclosed that Egypt and Syria were attacking Israeli positions in the Sinai Peninsula and on the Golan Heights. A siren went off. The Yom Kippur War had begun.

Judging by the frantic call-up of reservists on Oct. 5, the war was not a failure of Israeli intelligence, but a failure to evaluate the data correctly. Blinded by its victory in the 1967 Six Day War, and led into complacency by its ability to fend off Egypt and Syria in the 1967-70 War of Attrition, Israel refused to believe that the Arabs would launch hostilities without air superiority. The assumption was badly flawed.

In all probability, the war might have been avoided if Golda Meir, Israel's prime minister, had appreciated the significance of President Anwar al-Sadat's proposal for a pull-back of Israeli forces from the Suez Canal. Ministers in the cabinet urged her to accept the plan, but she demurred. If Egypt and Israel had signed an agreement, Syria most likely would not have gone to war.

Egypt's and Syria's objective was limited: to regain the Sinai and the Golan, not to conquer Israel itself. Gunner Jarring's peace mission, sponsored by the United Nations, had collapsed. To Egypt and Syria, there was only one way to break the political logjam: war. In retrospect, Sadat and Hafez al-Assad of Syria were right. The war – which cost Israel frightful casualties but which lifted Egypt's and Syria's self-esteem – spawned a series of disengagement agreements in the Sinai and the Golan, all brokered by the United States. These, in turn, eventually prompted Sadat to visit Jerusalem and to sign a historic peace treaty with Israel. Thereafter, Washington played a central and indispensable role in Mideast peacemaking and peacekeeping.

Militarily, the war was essentially a draw. Egypt and Syria pushed Israel to the brink. Israel regained the initiative on the Golan, but faced a war of attrition there. In Sinai, Israel surrounded the Third Army, but could not dislodge Egyptian forces. The short-lived myth of Israeli military superiority was punctured. The war also discredited Golda Meir and catapulted a sabra, Yitzhak Rabin, into power for the first time.

Yizkor books get new readers

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Where might you expect to hear a tale of an enchanted Passover seder where all participants fall asleep at the table before even the first glass of wine is consumed? Or of a blind cantor who, during a brief visit to town, sings so sweetly in synagogue that the whole community is mesmerized for weeks?

How about an old woman obsessed with sewing her own burial shroud and trying it on for a perfect fit? Or an account of a melee that erupts during a wedding party because young men and women dare to dance together?

One would think such colorful stories may have come out of a book of Jewish fairy tales and legends, or perhaps from a novel by Isaac Bashevis Singer or Chaim Grade. Instead, they may be found in From A Ruined Garden, a wonderful compendium of excerpts from Polish memorial books (Yizkor bucher) which recently came out in a second printing (Indiana University Press).

First published in 1983, From A Ruined Garden: The Memorial Books of Polish Jewry, contains some 60 excerpts from Yizkor bucher, translated from the original Yiddish or Hebrew into English by American sociologists Jack Kugelmass and Jonathan Boyarin.

Besides the various warm and often humorous tales of prewar shtetl life, the book carries sombre accounts of political activities in the shtetl and, ultimately, the criminal devastation that occurred after 1939.

In the half-century since the Shoah, more than 600 Yizkor bucher have appeared, chronicling communities large and small, at least 450 of them in Poland. The others deal with an uneven sprinkling of towns in Belarus, Greece, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Romania, Ukraine and the former Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia.

Although a respected scholar once cavalierly dismissed these earnest monuments of love and grief as "tombstones, not books," Kugelmass and Boyarin remind us that memorial books capture the life as well as the death of many a town. From A Ruined Garden also contains YIVO head librarian Zachary Baker's updated bibliography of Eastern European Memorial Books, as well as an index of places mentioned in the text.

New and improved, From A Ruined Garden remains an excellent means by which readers with no Yiddish or Hebrew may sample the contents of memorial books.

Two Internet sites associated with JewishGen [www.jewishgen.org] offer more useful resources for researchers investigating ancestral shtetls. First, the ShtetLinks project offers detailed information about dozens of former Jewish communities in Belarus, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Modlova, Romania, Bessarabia, Slovakia, Ukraine and elsewhere.

Second, portions of roughly 36 Yizkor books are available in translation under the JewishGen section on Yizkor Book Translations. In many cases, the contents are summarized and several chapters presented in English. Towns and regions include Bobruisk, Belarus; Debica, Poland; Kisvarda, Hungary; and Yampol and Transnistra, Ukraine.

Two related bibliographic resources have proven invaluable to researchers in pinpointing ancestral shtetls that may be hard to pronounce or spell. Where Once We Walked, by Gary Mokotoff and Sallyann Sack presents a system of shtetl location involving a phonetic numerical code that has proven remarkably effective. The WOWW Companion by Mokotoff allows researchers to draw accurate maps of the regions where their ancestors once walked. (Both books are published by Avotaynu, Inc., 201-387-7200.)

Concluding the holidays

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

As we approach the final days of Sukkot, we celebrate three days with their own unique traditions. While Hoshanah Rabbah, Shemini Atzeret and Simchat Torah don't enjoy the popularity on the Web as other holidays, there are some sites on the Jewish Highway well worth the visit.

The seventh day of Sukkot is called Hoshanah Rabbah because on that day the word Hoshanah (please save) is recited frequently [http://www.virtual.co.il./city_services/holidays/sukkot-8Atzeret/simchat.htm]. For a very interesting article on how the word Hoshanah found its way into the English language, see Eliezer Siegel's Hosanna [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/930929_Hosanna.html].

Although Hoshanah Rabbah is considered a very special day, it does not share the same work prohibitions as other Jewish holidays. That's why you can watch an online video taken of the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach as he conducted a two-hour Hoshanah Rabbah service at New York City's Congregation Kehilath Jacob [http://www.613.org/video.html].

From there we move on to Shemini Atzeret/Simchat Torah, celebrated for one day in Israel and for two days elsewhere. Considered a separate holiday from Sukkot, it marks the annual completion of the reading of the Torah and the celebration of its start with the story of Genesis [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/sukkos/].

Surely one of the holiday's highlights for any child is dancing around the Torah while waving a flag – maybe even adorned by an apple. If you want help making your own flag, you may want to use some of the images that you can download at The Gallery of Free Jewish Clip Art [http://www.geocities.com/SoHo/Gallery/6844/images.html]. There are several images of Torahs and other seasonal graphics of sukkot, lulavs and etrogs. Just print them out, color them in, glue them to a stick and add one apple. For more holiday links, see the Simchat Torah Link L'cha [http://bethel-sudbury.org/linksimc.htm].

After the holiday winds down, you are faced with the task of taking down your sukkah, and trying to remember just how you were able to fit it into your garage last year. If your sukkah has seen better days and won't last one more year, you may be wondering how to dispose of it.

According to Ohr Somayach's Ask the Rabbi, holy items such as Torah scrolls, tfillin and mezuzot should be buried, while sukkot wood should be burned, perhaps with your chametz or placed in your fireplace for a Shabbat fire [http://www.jer1.co.il/education/education/ohr/ask/ask100.htm]. The Web site points out that it is disrespectful to merely throw items of holiness in the garbage, and then concludes with a personal anecdote that it suggests could only happen in Israel:

"I was once walking to yeshiva when I passed a garbage truck moving slowly down the street. The garbage man standing in back of the truck was trying to get my attention. Then I noticed he was holding something long and black in his outstretched arm, and he was motioning for me to take it. 'Burnt spaghetti?' I wondered. I reached out and took it. It was a tfillin strap. 'This shouldn't be in the garbage,' said the garbage man. 'You'll know what to do with it.'"

Yom Kippur in Tangiers

By MESSOD BOUSSIDAN

There is, however, one memory of Yom Kippur, in particular, that has remained with me despite the passage of time. I am in a small synagogue in Tangiers, standing next to my grandfather, and we are both draped beneath his tallit. Everyone in the sanctuary is standing, and the sound of rhythmic and impassioned chanting fills the room.

With the benefit of experience and education, I have come to conclude that this long-subsisting image in my psyche was a moment during the Neilah or the closing service of Yom Kippur.

For those of you unfamiliar with a Moroccan Neilah service, this column will not do justice in fully describing it. It is a solemn and powerful service that concludes a day of prayers that are clear and direct in their message of individual supplication, repentance and forgiveness, and at times, searing in their imagery.

By the time of the Neilah, the sanctuary is usually filled beyond capacity. The men cover themselves in their tallitot and the men's section spreads out like a sea of white. The service opens with the congregation reciting in unison a piyut authored by Rabbi Moses Ibn Ezra (11th century Spain) whose first two stanzas, translated below, articulate the mood of the people at this momentous point in the day.

"Oh God who is awesome in deed/ Oh God who is awesome in deed/ Grant us forgiveness/ At the time of the closing of the Gates/ Those who are called "few in numbers/ Lift an eye to you/ And tremble fearfully/ At the time of the closing of the Gates."

Earlier on in the Minuhah service, the congregation has recited the famous piyut Et Shaare Ratzon, likely authored by Rabbi Yehudah Ibn Abbes. This piyut is based upon the account of the binding of Isaac in Genesis and begins with an open request to God to recall the merits of our forefathers Abraham and Isaac when judging each of us:

"At the time that the Gates of Favor are to be opened/ On the day that my hands are spread to God/ Please remember now on my behalf/ On this day of rebuke/ The one who bound, the one who was bound and the altar."

Relatively brief as it may be, our Neilah service creates an ambiance of solemnity for the congregants. This is achieved, not only through the words of the selected piyutim and selihot, but also through the specific music utilized in this service. The Neilah concludes with the entire congregation exclaiming heavenward in one compelling voice the 13 Attributes of God. At the same time, the piercing wall of multiple shoferot resonates through the sanctuary.

That moment in the Neilah has always been a very moving experience for me, in which our connection with God, and recognition that the heavenly gates are in fact "closing" is pristine in its clarity.

This year, for the first time, I intend to have my 3-year-old son by my side during the Neilah service. As we are both cloaked beneath my tallit it will be my fervent hope that his memory of this service will be as much of a guide in his developing relationship with God as it has been with mine.

The categorical imperative

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

Some two centuries ago, perhaps in his habitual daily walks at 4:30 p.m. (people would set their watches by his appearance), Immanuel Kant devised the categorical imperative, which basically states that whatever action you are about to take in life, ask yourself what would happen if everyone in the world acted in a similar fashion.

Many Jews with whom I have spoken in the last number of years have engaged in a tragically fascinating assault on this maxim. "I am not a practising Jew, but I want the religion to survive," they will say.

The inconsistency inherent in this message, especially when it is directed at children – "I do not want to sacrifice my lifestyle to Judaism, but don't you dare marry a shiksa" (with all the ugliness that word conveys) – is not in the least misunderstood by Jewish kids. Their antennae are always on the alert for the crack in their parents' world view, which the children then split wide open as adults and cross through to the other side of assimilation.

Besides the self-evident contradiction in hoping and expecting Judaism to flourish while not personally engaging in its perpetuation, there is an even more poignant aspect to this abandonment of religious observance. (Yes, that's observance – not playing in the Jewish hockey league or eating at the "Jewish style" deli, or laughing at Jackie Mason jokes, or a dozen other substitutions that we have somehow managed to rationalize as an authentic Jewish identity.)

The greater damage is simply the loss of spiritual possibility for each Jew, as this chassidic tale illustrates: A certain Rabbi Yechiel went to visit his teacher in the town of Kotzk. When he returned home, he was asked by his father-in-law what he had learned. He answered by asking his father-in-law to interpret the words "you shall not steal."

That's obvious, his father-in-law answered. "It means you shall not steal from your fellow man."

"Well," replied Rabbi Yechiel, "in Kotzk they interpret it to mean, you shall not steal from yourself."

As if to bring this story to life, a very intelligent and gifted psychiatrist once said to me, as we were casually talking about religion, "Well that's your department." As if somehow the notion of God, of meaning in human life, of the development of a moral order and a community of human beings who learn to cultivate spiritual values, is left only to the clergy and the religious faithful.

He meant his comment kindly, but at that moment he was really stealing from himself. "Don't leave it to me," I said, "you are fully capable of entering that world, too."

There will be Jews around, many of them, well into the next century and beyond, assuming the Messiah is delayed. But it is the nature of Judaism itself that will look different. The question is not Jewish continuity, but what kind of Judaism.

There is a feeling one gets today of the middle ground dropping out, of either a kind of insular monasticism at one end or the great assimilated masses at the other end. My fear is, quite frankly, with those Jews who haven't yet officially thrown in the towel, but whose life choices are taking them and their children further and further away from Judaism.

There is no institution – not a shul, not a day school, nor a Jewish summer camp – that can truly compensate for the living Judaism carried out within the family. The spiritual yearnings of our children are knocking, but the blinds are drawn, the lights are out, the car has left the driveway. Nobody's home.

By Bernard Baskin

Drug Crazy, by Mike Gray (Random House, $33.50).

Some weeks ago, a special United Nations conference on drugs took place in New York. More than 600 individuals, many of them internationally well known, delivered an open letter to the conference urging the United Nations to reconsider its traditional position on drugs.

The message of Mike Gray's hard-hitting book is that the war against drugs is being lost. He argues that despite an 80-year battle in the United States to fight drug use through prohibition, and despite expenditures of $300 billion (US) in the last 15 years, drug production, sale, and use continue unabated. He further contends that this unremitting battle is tearing apart the social fabric of the United States.

Few are the government anti-drug agencies not contaminated by corruption. While the vast majority of drug users are white, those convicted of drug sale or use are overwhelmingly black and Hispanic. Already, 400,000 persons convicted of drug use languish behind bars.

Moreover, the U.S. Constitution is regularly disregarded in the search for drug convictions. Warrantless searches and the seizure of property often take the place of due process. With "zero tolerance" the goal, civil liberties are blatantly disregarded.

The customary weapons against drugs just don't work. The author is convinced that prohibition encourages organized crime, distorts the market place and hinders health care. Despite massive efforts, the annual illicit drug industry is worth an estimated $400 billion – an astonishing eight percent of total world trade.

Forced onto the black market, drug sales inevitably fall into the hands of the most ruthless criminals. In the search for profit, these criminals will produce those drugs that are the most profitable and the easiest to produce.

Thus, when the price of cocaine goes up, crack (very cheap and highly addictive) is created. Gray argues that control, not prohibition, is the answer. Hard-core drug addicts must be allowed treatment that includes legal access to the drugs on which they are dependent. A tightly controlled legal drug market would end illicit drug trafficking and its costs in blood and money.

The author records the words of former Colombian high court judge Gomez Hutado, who told Americans at a drug-policy conference in 1993 "Forget about drug deaths and acquisitive crime and addiction and AIDS. All this pales into insignificance before the prospect facing the liberal societies of the West. The income of the drug barons is greater than the American defence budget. With this financial power they can suborn the institutions of the state and, if the state resists…they can purchase the firepower to outgun it. We are threatened with a return to the Dark Ages."

Gray is sure that "a tightly controlled legal market, offering clean, unadulterated pharmaceuticals, would instantly terminate the cash flow to the street bazaar, and the river of money that has fuelled the most brutal collection of criminal combines in the history of the planet would dry up."

Drug Crazy, simply but effectively written, is rich in examples of how the drug trade affects people in high and low places, and offers profiles of villains and heroes, profiteers and victims.

Consular Records which were the subject of last month's column, advises that the index shows only names collected in the United States, not Canada. The Canadian consulate collection, known as LIRA-MA, is subject to more strict privacy regulations.

"When it came time for Canada to decide how to handle [its] part of the consular records collection, [it] opted to create an elaborate index but not to release the records themselves until the 100-year rule was met," Wynne says.

Wynne, incidentally, is the author of a new and very useful genealogical guidebook. Finding Your Jewish Roots in Galicia: A Resource Guide (also published by Avotaynu) is by far the fullest and most encyclopedic treatment of the subject to date. A resident of Maryland, Wynne is the founder of Gesher Galicia, a special interest group for persons with Galician ancestry.

Community Matters

Campaign Target Within Sight

The Campaign for Fifty is seeing 20/20 as it enters its fifth week. Average pledge increases of over 20% from more than 9,000 donors have propelled the community's largest fund-raising drive well past the $20 million mark.

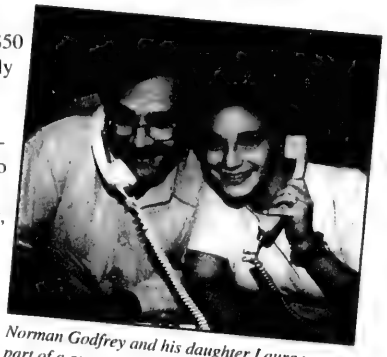
"With this incredible momentum and the community's continued generous response, we are well on our way to our $50 million goal," enthuses Howard Price, Vice-Chair of the community Campaign for Fifty. "People are recognizing the need and throwing their support behind UJA Federation," adds Price.

Campaign for Fifty Co-Chairs Brent Belzberg and Larry Tanenbaum and a record number of UJA Federation volunteers have raised $22 million to date, including what Price calls "an amazing $4 million in increased giving."

Glennie Lindenberg, who is also Vice-Chair of the Campaign for Fifty with Abe Glowinsky, attributes the campaign's early success to a strong leadership and an increased awareness about UJA Federation in the community. "Not only have Brent and Larry been successful in canvassing our leading donors," notes Lindenberg, "their tremendous commitment and energy have filtered down and inspired others to do the same."

"I continue to be impressed with how much we've accomplished in such a short period of time," adds UJA Federation Women's Campaign Chair Judy Engel. "In my long association with UJA Federation, I've never seen so much support from our veteran volunteers and contributors, as well as our first timers."

UJA Federation's Campaign for Fifty, to raise $50 million annually by 2001, will provide $13.5 million in additional dollars to strengthen Jewish identity, provide more assistance to the vulnerable and rescue Jews from unstable regions around the world, such as the former Soviet Union.



Norman Godfrey and his daughter Laura were part of a group of 70 March of the Living alumni who participated in UJA Federation's Super Week telethons helping to raise more than $135,000 in one night.

Voices from the Heart
Guns Bolts and Diplomacy

The following is an edited excerpt, the third in a series, from Voices from the Heart: A Community Celebrates 50 Years of Israel, edited by Bonnie Goldstein and Jaclyn Shulman, published by McClelland & Stewart Inc. The book, a collection of personal reflections by Canadians about their experiences in Israel, was produced as part of Toronto's Israel at 50 celebrations. This unique 395-page volume is available at a special price by calling UJA Federation at (416) 631-5685.

By Edwin Goodman

Because I grew up in a Zionist home, my personal connection with Palestine and Israel goes back to my early youth. But my first trip to Israel came in 1963. After a boat trip in the Aegean with friends, Ann Dubin, my late wife Suzanne, and I flew on to Israel.

The day we arrived and checked in to the King David Hotel, Ann and I went for an evening stroll. We were not more than two hundred yards from the hotel when we heard a guttural shout and the noise of a gun bolt being drawn back. We looked up quickly and saw a huge pile of sandbags and a shouting Arab sentry. We beat a hasty retreat.

Another vivid memory also dates from the 1960s, and is one of many examples I could give of Canadian politicians helping Israel. I received a telephone call from the late Yaacov Herzog, Israel's Ambassador to Canada at the time. He asked whether I could persuade Prime Minister John Diefenbaker to invite David Ben-Gurion to Canada. He explained that President Kennedy was in the midst of discussions with the Arabs, and would not allow Ben-Gurion to come to the United States. However, Yaacov Herzog went on, if Ben-Gurion were in Canada, the Americans could not very well stop him from continuing across the border.

I approached Mr. Diefenbaker and he agreed. The Americans raised hell, but "Dief" told them he was the prime minister of Canada and made the decisions, not them, and Ben-Gurion did indeed come. Our Prime Minister entertained him - and then he went on to the United States.

Toronto ORT Golden Circle lunch honors authors

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Bonnie Goldstein and Jaclyn Shulman, editors of Voices from the Heart, a collection of personal stories, anecdotes and reflections celebrating the first 50 years of Israel, were honored recently at Toronto region of ORT Canada's Golden Circle Luncheon.

ORT, with 260,000 students worldwide, operates 800 schools and programs in 50 countries. It is dedicated to technical and vocational training in a Jewish environment.

Funds raised at the luncheon, held at the home of Maxine Granovsky-Gluskin and Ira Gluskin, provide scholarships at the Joseph Harmatz ORT School of Engineering on the campus of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. A perpetual scholarship will be awarded to a needy student.

'Great storytellers'

"Pound for pound, story upon story, Voices from the Heart is an important literary contribution to the Toronto community," said Ruth Druxerman, co-chair of the event with Helen Friedman.

"We are great storytellers, and these vignettes and pictures must be passed on from generation to generation. All of us here today are indebted to Bonnie and Jaclyn for capturing so many memorable moments for posterity," said Druxerman.

In August 1997, Goldstein and Shulman were approached by Julia Koschitzky, chair of Israel at 50, and Karen Morton, chair of Israel at 50 Showcase at the CNE's Israel Pavilion, to undertake the creation of the commemorative book, which was published by McClelland & Stewart.

"We took the risk – and the response was overwhelming," said Goldstein. "The Toronto community took our project to heart, immediately responding with great feeling."

She added that they looked for stories that would reflect the rich diversity of the community. Within 60 days, they had 500 submissions.

"We had only a few months to gather and give structure to these stories. And by the time we realized how impossible this all was, we were almost finished," said Goldstein.

Shulman said that the book grew from 200 to 400 pages. "For us, receiving these stories produced moments of surprising coincidences." They discovered that several people had been at the same place at the same historic moment, each unknown to the others.

"Extraordinary events unfolded before us, often producing those shivering goose-bump moments," said Shulman. "We had the privilege of preserving the individual voice of each of these storytellers. Together, their many stories have created a story that is truly universal. We have assembled the book, but the stories are theirs."

In recognition of their efforts, Goldstein and Shulman were presented with inscribed book holders and commemorative pins created by Toronto sculptor Al Green.

A special tribute was paid to the late Bertha Dermer, founder of Golden Circle. "Bertha Dermer was Golden Circle," said Friedman. "It flourished under her leadership. It was Bertha who introduced me to ORT's Golden Circle. We worked together for almost 20 years. She was my mentor."

Gord Berger, recently elected president of Toronto ORT, talked about the upcoming launch of ORT Navigating the Bible – a World ORT Union's Web site, which contains the Five Books of Moses.

Kathleen Crook, national president of ORT Canada, spoke of the expanding work of ORT, and thanked Koschitzky and Morton "for their participation in making this Golden Circle a success." She introduced the new Golden Circle patrons and thanked them "on behalf of the ORT students who will benefit from your generous support."

The luncheon raised more than $50,000.

Jewish academic fascinated by German studies

Academia

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Mark Joel Webber, a specialist in German language and literature, has heard the pointed questions before.

"What are you doing in this field? Doesn't it disgust you? How can you go to Germany? Stuff like that."

In short, what business does a nice Jewish boy like himself have in German studies after an unprecedented and unique disaster like the Holocaust?

The short answer is uncommonly straightforward. The discipline fascinates him. The longer answer is a bit more complicated. " I try to understand different worlds, to jump over borders. I try to figure out and explain Germans to Jews and Jews to Germans."

As interim co-director of the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies at York University, he is ideally suited for that role.

Officially inaugurated last November after a nation-wide competition among Canadian universities, the centre is a cooperative venture of the German Academic Exchange Service, a German government agency, York University and the University of Montreal. (There are similar centres in the United States and Britain.)

Its mandate is three-fold: to educate the next generation of Canadian experts – scholars, journalists, diplomats and entrepreneurs – in German and European affairs; to stimulate and conduct research on Germany and Europe, especially in areas where Canadian and European interests intersect; and to promote an awareness of German and European issues.

Not surprisingly, the centre, which offers a graduate diploma in German and European studies, has close academic and administrative ties with York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, headed by Michael Brown.

"There are many points of common interest," said Webber. "The topics – the Holocaust, immigration, Diaspora relations, the history of Jews in Germany, right-wing extremism – are intertwined."

Mark Joel Webber

Human Rights and Institute for International Affairs, recently helped organize a teachers' trip to Israel to deepen their understanding of the Holocaust.

And just as Brown is on the board of the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies, so Webber sits on the executive of the Centre for Jewish Studies.

Webber, who co-directs the centre with the University of Montreal's Hans-Herbert Raekel, plans to leave his current position after a joint permanent director is appointed later this year.

"I don't want the job," he said. "I want more time for reading, writing and family."

Webber, whose wife Janet is a York University instructor in English literature, was born in St. Louis, Mo. Today, he holds dual Canadian-American citizenship.

In the high school he attended, it was mandatory to take a modern language course. He chose German. The teacher had an excellent reputation, and Webber wanted to solve a puzzle. The final movement in Beethoven's ninth concert, which his father Joseph was fond of playing on the piano, contained German words that had piqued his curiosity.

Joseph, a salesman who had served with the American army's historical corps in Germany during World War II, reinforced Webber's interest in German by recounting stories of his days as a soldier.

"My parents," he added, "encouraged me to study German. But I never thought the German language course would lead me to German studies."

Webber, 53, was hired by York University in 1972. He came to Canada after completing a BA at Harvard (where he decided to become a Germanist) and postgraduate degrees at Yale.

"German language and literature was what I enjoyed most. I was good at it."

In retrospect, ignorance may well have been a factor in his career choice, conceded Webber, whose Russian and Lithuanian ancestors settled in the United States in the 1880s.

"It's debatable whether I would have pursued German had I been fully aware of the Holocaust. But I'm still fascinated by [German studies] on emotional and intellectual grounds. I have something important to offer, to myself and others."

Jews, he disclosed, are prominently represented in German studies in the United States and, to a lesser degree, in Canada.

In 1997, he taught a course on critical issues in Germany (as well as a humanities course on the place of animals in Western literature), and this year he is lecturing on

Reform summer camp planned

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — A summer camp run by the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ) is scheduled to open in 1999.

The 200-acre camp, which includes a five-acre island, is located on Maple Lake near Parry Sound, and will cater to children ages 8 to 16. The site will also be available for adult retreats and conferences throughout the year.

Financing for the project, which is expected to cost between $2 million and $3 million, will come from private donors.

"The question was raised [four years ago at a board meeting], of our desire to establish a camp in Canada, which would be the same as the nine camps that our parent body, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, has been running in the United States," says Gavin Herman, chair of the camp board and a member of the CCRJ executive.

"Some of these camps have been in operation for more than 45 years. Many Canadian kids have been going to the United States, and we wanted to build the same [type of camp] here," says Herman.

Currently, the site includes a kosher kitchen with a large dining room, a lodge with 30 private rooms and several meeting rooms, several staff/faculty cabins and two dorms. All of the buildings are winterized.

There is also an outdoor chapel, a recreation hall and a beach. The lot is fully serviced with plumbing and electricity.

Organizers say there are enough accommodations for staff and campers for the summer of 1999. However, infrastructure will be built to include sports facilities, such as basketball and tennis courts, and soccer fields.

"The difference at our camp [from others that attract Reform Jews] is the Jewish education that we provide. For example, we offer Torah study; full Shabbat observance; rabbis, cantors and educators as faculty; Israeli dance and song; and Hebrew learning for older kids...[There is] a strong sense of being and living as Jews – of course, mixed in with all of the traditional aspects of summer camping in Ontario.

"We have a great deal of support from the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC) – the parent body of Reform Judaism," says Herman.

Great deal of support from UAHC

The camp is to be run on a non-profit or cost-recovery basis. According to Herman, UHAC will underwrite any losses that may be incurred during the start-up phase.

"There could be a loss in year one. We're in for the long haul, not just a couple of years," says Herman.

Franz Kafka, who wrote his novels and short stories in German.

In his field of specialization, 19th century literature, Webber deals with such writers as Karl Gutzkow and Heinrich Laube, who even today are not widely known in Germany. Although they were heavily influenced by Heinrich Heine and Ludwig Boerne, both of whom were of Jewish origin, the writings of Laube and Gutzkow are contaminated by anti-Semitic elements.

Webber, whose other speciality is interculturality in German as a foreign language, scoffs at the notion that anti-Semitism in Germany is any more serious than, say, in France or Britain. There is, however, one huge difference. "Germany is where the Shoah started," he said, noting that the language, the culture and the symbols can be jarring to Jews.

Webber, whom the German government has honored for promoting German-Jewish understanding, is doubtful whether Germans and Jews can put their relationship on a "normal" footing in his own lifetime.

Yet he praises Germany for its efforts to come to terms with the past. "On the whole, Germany has done a better job in this respect than almost any other country."

He is skeptical about the value of Daniel Goldhagen's best-seller, Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust. "What was good about the book – some of the archival work on police battalions and death marches – wasn't particularly new. What was new – his theory of exterminationist German anti-Semitism – wasn't especially good."

Considering himself an objective observer of Germany, he hews to the belief that there is no such thing as collective guilt or collective forgiveness.

As far as Germany's Jewish community is concerned, he thinks it will keep on growing if new immigrants from the former Soviet Union continue to pour in.

But Webber, who has lived in Germany twice during sabbaticals in the 1980s and 1990s, said, "It's still hard to be a Jew in Germany."

JSU planning to relocate its premises at U of T

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's not much to look at, but it's home — at least for now.

The University of Toronto's Jewish Students' Union (JSU) is still headquartered in a University College basement with alarmingly low ceilings, but the director of Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto, the umbrella group for post-secondary campuses here, is optimistic about relocating by the beginning of the year 2000.

Discussions have been finalized regarding the leasing of a house at the northwest corner of Huron Street and Harbord Avenue, said Zac Kaye. "We're in the final negotiating stages."

Jewish Campus Services is working in tandem with UJA Federation through the latter's Legacy Campaign, to raise funds for the new site and other campus projects, he added.

Meanwhile, the JSU calendar is full, and a steady – if modest – stream of students continues to drop by to eat lunch, shmooze, study or listen to music.

Chayim Newman, a student who transferred to U of T this year, says the JSU is a place to chill or hang out. On a large campus, he believes, "everybody's just a number. This is where you find a sense of community."

Michelle Lackie, a 26-year-old native of St. Catharines who was hired as JSU program director in August (replacing Lance Davis, now JCS' director of education), hopes that more students will find that same sense of community.

An updated JSU database has almost 700 names, despite U of T's estimated 3,000-strong Jewish student population. (By comparison, York University's Jewish Student Federation, with similar Jewish demographics, has over 1,200 names.)

The large percentage of commuter students and stereotypes about the JSU both account for the relatively small number of involved students, Lackie believes.

She wants students to know that the JSU is "not just a religious venue. We're a pluralistic group. We try to program for everyone."

Upcoming activities include a Lunch and Learn program on Jewish battered women, an intergenerational tea in conjunction with the Bloor JCC seniors' group, a wine-and-cheese for graduate students, and events for Holocaust Education Week in November and Israel Week in March. A charity beer bash was set for this past weekend.

In addition to Lackie, the JSU has two staff program associates who work part time with residence and graduate students, as well as the Jewish Campus Services team that includes an arts and culture coordinator. Lackie said, however, that the programs are student-run and student-driven.

Although one student expressed "disappointment" to The CJN over a perceived loss of student autonomy since JCS was established three years ago, JSU president Ilan Barda, who heads the 22 person JSU student board, said, "It's definitely our show. [The staff] know that, and they're cool about that."

Programming is geared to satisfying the needs of Jewish students and also to educating non-Jewish ones, he noted.

Lackie, a teacher by training, who much prefers informal over formal education, sees her role as a facilitator or adviser.

"We're an open and welcoming group," she said. "We're open to new ideas. If you're looking for a place to meet, or to question or challenge your Jewish identity, or be a part of something, then come."

Arab-Israeli conflict a 'local issue,' says Kissinger

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The notion that if Israel would only give up a little more territory all would be quiet in the Middle East is "ridiculous," said former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger.

Speaking to a standing-room only audience at Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron, Kissinger said the Arab-Israeli conflict, while still intense between the Palestinians and Israelis, has become a "local issue" in contrast to the central place it occupied in the region in the 1970s.

"Today, for most Arab nations, the Arab-Israeli conflict is more of a nuisance than a challenge, and many would like it to go away," he said.

Kissinger, who was secretary of state to presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford, described himself as "one of the few people who does not find it incompatible to have been a friend of Yitzhak Rabin and to respect Benjamin Netanyahu."

The Oslo accords were right because they made Israel "a legitimate member of the international community. But the step-by-step approach [to territorial negotiations] is at an end. There's not enough territory left to deal with in stages," he said.

Kissinger thinks Netanyahu's "basic strategy in the overall negotiations is correct. He's just not as good at tactics as at strategy."

In response to a question from Canadian-Israel Committee Quebec chair Thomas Hecht suggesting Israel has been the subject of a double standard because the world has pressed it to take "security risks for peace," Kissinger said, "Certainly, the question of Israel's survival depends on margins [of land] so narrow it is very hard for a continental country like the United States to understand."

Much of the pressure for concessions, he said, has stemmed from the fact that many of the experts are "Arabists," who have viewed Israel as "an element that has disturbed Arab equilibrium. If it was not for Israel's intransigence, the Middle East would be calm [they think]."

The impact of the Oslo agreement was to "reduce this illegitimacy of Israel in the world. Israel became widely recognized as a force for peace, so not all the pressure is on Israel," he said.

The only two routes for the coexistence of the many states of the Middle East are "the hegemony of one or a balance between them. I think hegemony is extremely dangerous and a balance is desirable."

An alliance of Turkey, Israel, Jordan and maybe other states could contribute to this equilibrium, said the 1973 Nobel Peace Prize winner.

One thing is sure, with so many of the leaders getting old, major changes are going to take place over the next decade as they are replaced, Kissinger said.

About 2,000 people attended the free lecture, sponsored by the synagogue's foundation in memory of Mike Dym, including those who watched on closed-circuit television. The line-up started outside the synagogue two hours before the lecture's start.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, in introducing Kissinger, commented that "wherever he went, he was a strong American patriot and never forgot he was a Jew."

The introduction reminded Kissinger of the story of an American Jew who told Golda Meir that he didn't like Kissinger because "he was an American first, a secretary of state second and a Jew third.

Kissinger, who has been chair of his own consulting firm since 1982, and was a member of the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board from 1984-90, gave a wide-ranging overview of international affairs.

Renowned N.Y. cantor to appear at Ottawa concert

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Joseph Malovany, the world renowned cantor of New York's prestigious Fifth Avenue Synagogue, is coming to Ottawa.

At the concert, sheduled for Nov. 4 at the Agudath Israel Congregation, Malovany will be the featured performer and will be joined by Ottawa Cantor Stephen Chaiet and the choirs of both Agudath Israel and Montreal's Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue under the direction of Stephen Glass.

In addition to his cantorial duties, Malovany is currently Distinguished Professor of Liturgical Music at Yeshiva University and Dean of the J.D.C. Moscow Academy of Jewish Music.

Described as "the Pavarotti of the synagogue," Malovany performs to rave reviews around the world as a soloist with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra and other acclaimed orchestras.

Chaiet, a tenor, has performed with the Canadian Opera Company and the Opera Company of Hamilton and has given recitals at the National Gallery of Canada, the Canadian Museum of Civilization and the National Arts Centre.

As cantor of Agudath Israel, Ottawa's largest synagogue, Chaiet's renditions of liturgical music reflect his years of study with world famous master Cantor David Bagley.

The concert, in honor of Israel's 50th anniversary, will be sponsored by the Lieff Foundation. Advance tickets are available from Agudath Israel, and a limited number of tickets will be available at the door, 1400 Coldrey Avenue.

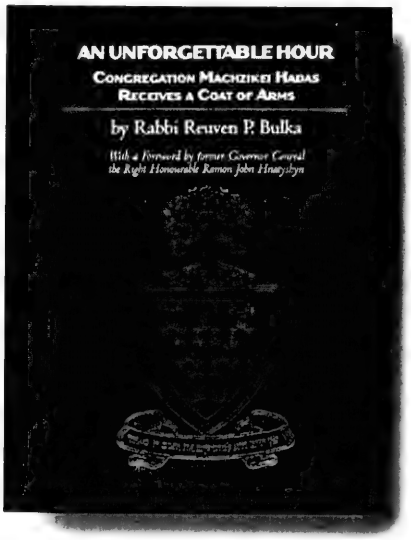
Book marks shul's achievement



AN UNFORGETTABLE HOUR
CONGREGATION MACHZIKEI HADAS RECEIVES A COAT OF ARMS
by Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka
With a Foreword by former Governor General
the Right Honourable Ramon John Hnatyshyn

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Congregation Machzikei Hadas recently hosted a unique launch for a book commemorating the day it became the first shul in the Commonwealth to receive a coat of arms.

The book, An Unforgettable Hour: Congregation Machzikei Hadas Receives a Coat of Arms, by Rabbi Reuven Bulka, records that historic day in November 1994.

Among those present at the book launch were Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, former governor general Ray Hnatyshyn, Chief Herald of Canada Robert Watt and Ottawa Deputy Mayor Allan Higdon.

In his greetings, Watt remarked that "being here this evening gives me a fresh and welcome opportunity to thank Rabbi Bulka for giving me a deeper understanding of your faith."

Stephen Greenberg, vice-president of the Jewish Community Council/Vaad Ha'Ir, told Rabbi Bulka: "You bring honor not only to your congregation but to our entire community."

Gray spoke of the symbolism of the coat of arms which "shows a tree with maple leaves, intending to show the deep roots of this synagogue of which I am proud to be a member... It shows how the people of our community, the people of this congregation led by Rabbi Bulka are not only deeply rooted in Alta Vista [in Ottawa], but in Canada."

Hnatyshyn charmed the audience with his warmth, humor and obvious affection for Rabbi Bulka and the members of the congregation whom he had come to know through the coat of arms project.

Members of the audience who had contributed to the coat of arms project received copies of the the book, which Rabbi Bulka and Hnatyshyn autographed upon request.

Hamas planning attacks

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

GAZA — Hamas is planning a massive terrorist attack within the Green Line to avenge the killing of two members of its military wing, according to warnings received by Israeli security officials.

With the discovery of a bomb laboratory in Hebron and the explosion of a car belonging to Hamas activists near Ramallah last week, security officials say it has become clear that preparations for a larger terrorist attack are underway.

Meanwhile, two Hamas leaders have admitted that the recent security measures taken against the movement's military wing have led to a drop in its activities.

"Our military wing is encountering many difficulties, mainly as a result of American-Israeli-Palestinian cooperation hindering Hamas fighters' activity," Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin said at a news conference in Gaza last week.

Yassin, who was released from prison a year ago, confirmed that two Hamas members were arrested last week by Palestinian security services as they tried to cross into Israel, apparently on their way to carry out a terrorist attack. He pledged that "even if it is delayed, a response will come at the appropriate time."

Other Hamas sources said dozens of activists were arrested last week in the Gaza Strip.

Top Hamas leader Khaled Meshal made similar statements in a newspaper interview published last week, attributing the recent drop in the number of attacks carried out by the movement to "the difficult circumstances of the struggle. Three sides have come together to fight our heroes – the Zionist enemy, the Palestinian Authority's [PA] security forces and U.S. intelligence services, which are directly supervising the cooperation between the PA and the enemy."

Meshal, who was the target of a botched Mossad assassination attempt in Amman last year, said Hamas objects to the declaration of a Palestinian state as proposed by PA Chairman Yasser Arafat.

U.S. considers upgrading ties to Palestinian Authority

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

WASHINGTON — The United States is considering upgrading ties with the Palestinian Authority (PA), in light of the renewed momentum in the peace process, a White House spokesperson said.

U.S. President Bill Clinton discussed the issue at length with PA Chairman Yasser Arafat last week.

The two leaders "talked at some length about the arrangements that will exist. And they went back to an idea that has been broached in the past, of a U.S.-Palestinian committee that could formally work on, in effect, bilateral relations," spokesperson Mike McCurry said last week.

Clinton, McCurry said, favors the idea, and the Palestinians view the establishment of official ties with the United States as very important. The Palestinians have representation in the United States, but it is defined as a representation of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Official American documents still define areas under the Palestinian Authority as the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which are under Israeli occupation, and the status of which are to be determined in the Israeli-Palestinian interim agreement.

Clinton and Arafat also discussed the level of U.S. aid to the Palestinians.

"The president and the chairman focused on what is arguably a very important part of the future for the Palestinian people under the peace agreements that have been reached – and that's the level of economic assistance that will be there for the people of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip," McCurry said.

In the meantime, the White House and State Department are examining various options for an Israeli-Palestinian summit meeting in about two weeks.

According to the U.S. initiative, the summit would last several days and will include expanded teams of aides and experts on every side, in addition to the leaders.

Such a summit, during which the United States hopes to reach an agreement, requires the delegations to meet in as isolated a venue as possible, far from the eye of the media, but also close to Washington. The site must allow for direct contact between the delegations, but must be big enough to house the teams comfortably, and to allow each side to hold separate and closed consultations.

The White House has not ruled out the possibility of holding a summit in Maryland at Camp David or at the Wye Plantation, which have hosted dramatic summits in the past, but other possibilities, such as military camps or other government installations in the Washington area are also being considered.

German vote creates new situation for country's Jews

By ELIAHU SALPETER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper

Opinion

Whenever elections are held in Germany, the attention of the country's Jewish community is invariably focused on the number of votes received by right-wing extremists.

But from the Jewish standpoint, the recent elections have produced an entirely new situation. It is, of course, important that no extremist right-wing party received the five-percent minimum for obtaining a seat in the Bundestag, Germany's lower house of parliament.

However, the triumph of Gerhard Schroeder's Social Democrats after 16 years of Christian Democratic rule under Helmut Kohl is chiefly significant because it represents a genuine upheaval in German politics: not only has there been a change of parties and ideologies, there has also been a generational change. For the first time since the Holocaust, Germany will be led by someone who has no recollection of the Nazi regime.

Another factor to be considered in this context is the fact that a demographic change has also taken place in the composition of German Jewry. The Jewish population of Germany, which for decades consisted primarily of the elderly, and was numerically insignificant, is now one of Europe's larger Jewish communities. Thanks to Germany's policy of opening its gates to Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union, today's Jewish community is now 70,000-strong.

There were some young German Jews who before the elections said that if the neo-Nazi parties managed to win seats in the Bundestag, they would consider that a signal that it was time for Jews to pack their bags and leave Germany. But as election results demonstrated, the neo-Nazis were kept out of parliament; furthermore, if the severe crisis that Russia is undergoing continues, Germany will receive new waves of immigrants and the Jewish community can be expected to grow to near the 100,000 mark. Indeed, the most important item on the German Jewish agenda is the continued immigration and absorption of Russian Jews.

The Social Democrats have a more liberal immigration policy than the Christian Democrats. During the election campaign, the Social Democrats promised that if they were elected and their immigration policy became the official policy of the German government, the attitude of the public at large towards immigrants would undergo a change and there would be an end to the general impression that the government tacitly accepts the current wave of xenophobia.

It also appears to be a relatively safe bet that the Social Democrats, who will likely set up a coalition government with the environmentalist Green party, will upgrade the war against right-wing extremists.

Over recent years, new Jewish communities have sprung up in dozens of German cities and some of the members of these new communities are Russian immigrants whose absorption is creating a major financial headache for German Jewish organizations. The Social Democrats favor increasing welfare payments to the unemployed and for lower income brackets and its leaders have said that the party also supports similar increases in the financial assistance extended to recent immigrants.

Three other issues were of importance to Jewish voters in this election.

The first was restitution payments for the Jews from the former East Germany. Under the Communists, they were unable to submit applications for payments before the deadline. The leaders of Germany's two major parties have expressed support for the creation of a special restitution fund for East German Jews.

Both the Social Democrats and the Christian Democrats favor a plan under which German firms would make restitution payments to concentration camp inmates who were forced to work in their plants during the war.

A second issue divided the two major parties: the construction of a major memorial in downtown Berlin in memory of victims of the Holocaust. Kohl was strongly in favor of the idea, while Schroeder was much more low-key, and his candidate for the post of education minister in the new government is vigorously opposed to the project.

The third issue is German-Israeli relations, which are perceived as a "Jewish topic" by most Germans. The conventional wisdom – even if not explicitly stated – is that the change in government will also lead to certain changes in the nature of the ties between the two countries.

There are many who think that the Schroeder government will be cooler towards Israel – and especially its present leaders – than the Kohl regime.

Lawyer target of anti-Semitic campaign

By LEE YANOWITCH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Ever since the extreme-right National Front won control over the Mediterranean port city of Toulon, French prosecutor Albert Levy has been working in a war zone.

But after police showed up at his home early one Sunday morning last month and dragged him off to jail, he has been living a nightmare.

A determined enemy of corruption, in the area of France with the highest rate of white-collar crime, Levy's work over the last eight years has often resulted in his establishing links between an organized corruption network and local politicians.

When the xenophobic and anti-Semitic National Front won control of the Toulon municipality in 1995, Levy began receiving death threats, and the extreme-right press launched an anti-Semitic campaign targeting him.

When the wife of National Front mayor Jean-Marie Le Chevallier was found to be discriminating against non-Front members in filling city jobs, Levy refused to turn a blind eye, and won her conviction.

Earlier this month, a local magistrate succeeded in doing what the anti-Semitic diatribes had failed to: taking Levy out of action.

The prosecutor, who is Jewish, has been placed under investigation for "violating judicial secrecy." He is suspected of giving a local journalist court documents suggesting that members of the National Front municipality took bribes from a company awarded a contract to supply city school cafeterias.

Breaking judicial secrecy is a misdemeanor, although it is general practice in France, particularly in political corruption cases, with confidential court papers frequently appearing in newspapers.

But violators are rarely prosecuted, and few, if any, have ever been punished.

Nevertheless, Levy has been subjected to a series of humiliating measures entirely out of proportion with the accusations against him, including a ban on practising his profession pending trial, his lawyers say.

He has been released from jail, but is under judicial surveillance, and has been ordered to consult court-appointed psychiatrists following an initial, summary examination which found he was "paranoid because he sees fascists everywhere."

"Is it odd to see a lot of fascists in a city controlled by the National Front?" his lawyer, Alain Jakubowicz, said in an interview.

"He is the victim of a political vendetta. They are not only trying to get revenge and keep him from pursuing his work, but they want to destroy him."

The Magistrates' Union issued a statement supporting Levy, and denouncing "the psychiatric alibi and the professional ban. Such measures are a troubling reminder of the practices used in authoritarian regimes."

Moreover, when the court psychiatrists examined the 47-year-old prosecutor last week, their questions focused on the fact that he is Jewish.

"How do you experience your Judaism?" they asked. "Did any of your relatives die in the Holocaust?"

While there is no clear proof regarding who may have orchestrated the campaign against Levy, his lawyers believe the National Front is behind it, with justice officials simply giving in to political pressure.

"These people are saying he's paranoid because he's Jewish. So what they really mean to say is that there shouldn't be any Jewish prosecutors in cities controlled by the National Front," Jakubowicz said.

Pollution said to kill 293 a year in Tel Aviv

By ZAFRIR RINAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Some 293 people died last year from particle pollution in Tel Aviv, and experts blame most of the pollution on diesel engines used in buses, trucks and taxi cabs.

According to a report published in the World Transport Policy and Practice, and prepared by a panel of Israeli experts, particle pollution from diesel engines accounts for some 350 tons of an estimated 427 tons of particle pollution dumped into the air in Tel Aviv annually.

Particle pollution is pollution involving liquid or solid particles that are emitted by engines. The particles do not dissipate in the air, and when breathed into the lungs get trapped in the respiratory system, causing infections and other respiratory problems.

The 293 deaths represented seven percent of the 4,048 deaths (not counting accidents) recorded last year in the city.

The report says that particle pollution was responsible for 134 new cases of chronic bronchitis, and estimates that the total health costs of particle pollution tops $600 million (US) a year in lost work and hospitalizations.

The report, prepared by Dr. Gary Ginsberg, Joshua Shemer and Eric Karsenty of the Health Ministry, Aharon Serri of the Environment Ministry, Dr. Danny Koutik of the Electric Corporation, and Elaine Fletcher, an investigative reporter, is the first from official sources in Israel to link deaths to pollution.

According to the report, the number of people who died from pollution in the city last year was 10 times the number of those who were killed in automobile accidents in the city, more than the total of unnatural deaths, including murders, car accidents and work accidents.

According to studies overseas, particle pollution is particularly dangerous for the elderly, children and those with chronic respiratory problems. Unlike pollution from specific events, like fires, industrial accidents and accumulated smog, exposure to particle pollution is a daily occurrence.

To bring down the level of pollution, the report's authors recommended a campaign for the use of natural gas in commercial vehicles, and on the basis of "the polluter pays," they recommend a substantial increase in the price of diesel fuel both to reduce its use and to raise money to help pay for the health expenses resulting from the pollution.

Making its premiere on Oct. 4, Passages will be broadcast Sundays 8 p.m. on Crossroads Television, Station CTS on UHF Channel 36, and Rogers Cable 9.

Host-moderator Michael Kigel says the one-hour talk show gives audiences the opportunity to become closer to the truths of the Torah.

"Many of us read the Torah like a piece of literature, when in fact it is more like [the Jewish people's] photo album," says Kigel, a former philosophy professor at York University, and teacher at Yeshiva Bnei Tzion of Bobov.

"The Torah knows us better than we know ourselves. Through Passages, we are striving to make Scripture an intimate experience again by letting our distant family speak. This show invites our ancestors to teach us about our worst fears and most intimate hopes and aspirations."

Discussing Torah passages in the context of current Jewish and western society, the first 26 episodes of the show will focus on the Book of Genesis with emphasis on the dynamics of family relationships.

Keeping with a theme of "back to basics," Kigel says the show's format will be grounded in the traditional manner of Torah study, namely the hevrusah (friendship) between two students.

Most shows will feature a rabbi and a university professor of Jewish studies, who will present different viewpoints on scripture. Scheduled panelists for the first three programs are Rabbi Benjamin Hecht of Nishma, Prof. Howard Adelman from York University, and Prof. David Novak, director of Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto.

"We want to create a healthy intellectual tension that will bring fresh insights into Torah discussion for both novices and scholars."

The first Jewish content television show in Toronto since Canadian Jewish Focus in 1996, Passages was initiated as a condition of CTS' licensing application with the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission, to show alternative religious viewpoints.

"This is the first time in Canada that we have a broadcast program on the study of Hebrew Scriptures for a Jewish audience," Landau says.

Ecuador home to tiny Jewish community

By GERALD SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

Ecuador, with about 11 million predominantly Roman Catholic inhabitants, has a small Jewish community of about 1,000 families, mainly in Quito and Guauaquil.

Prior to 1933, there were only a handful of Jews in the whole country. In the late 1930s, however, Ecuador was one of the few countries in the world to admit Jews fleeing Europe. By 1945, there were nearly 3,000 new Jewish immigrant-refugees, the vast majority of whom were Orthodox Ashkenazim. A sprinkling of Sephardi Jews with family names like Montero and Cristobal had also arrived.

At its peak in the 1950s, the Jewish population was estimated to be over 4,000, and there were small communities even in the highland cities of Cuenca, Ambato, and Riobamba.

The Asociacion de Beneficia Israelita, founded in 1938, is the central body for Ecuador's Jews. It is based in the capital of Quito in the Andes Mountains, where it operates a synagogue, a cultural and recreational centre, and a home for the aged.

In Quito, I visited the shul at 18 de Septiembre no. 954, not far from the Colon Hilton hotel. This was once a Jewish neighborhood, although at present, most Jews live in the nearby suburbs at the base of the mountains that ring the capital. There is also a Jewish cemetery in the suburbs.

After passing through a security check outside the synagogue and leaving my passport with the Ecuadorian guard, I entered to find a modern, well-kept sanctuary where a bar mitzvah was scheduled to take place on the following Shabbat. The community has a rabbi from Colombia and arranged to bring a cantor from the United States for Rosh Hashanah.

I met an interesting longtime Quito resident, a survivor of the Holocaust from Poland, and we conversed in a mixture of Spanish, Yiddish and English. The synagogue has gone from Orthodox to Conservative to Reform, he said, to accommodate its changing membership and keep younger people coming. The Jewish population is aging, as young people often go to study and live in the United States.

Quito's Jews are mainly businesspeople involved in the retail of food and hotel supplies, mall-leasing and supermarkets. A small souvenir shop on Amazonas, Quito's fashionable main street, welcomes visitors with a hearty Shalom and Magen David on its sign. With a non-renewing population, however, the future of the Jews of Ecuador as a community is uncertain.

Community's future uncertain

Cuenca, Ecuador's third largest city, which had a thriving synagogue at one time, has only one remaining Jewish-German family.

As for the Israeli connection with Ecuador, there is a history of mutual support and friendship dating back to 1946. At that time, the Ecuadorian representative at the League of Nations suggested that the Jewish Agency in then-Palestine should be recognized as the "Jewish Government in Exile."

At the present time, the government of Ecuador has an embassy in Tel Aviv, while there is an Israeli Embassy in Quito on Eloy Alfaro Street no. 969.

In the late 1960s, a network of technical cooperation was established between the two countries in the areas of agriculture, water development and youth training.

At Quito's main bus terminal, I noticed a plaque at the entrance announcing that the structure was built by Solel Boneh, the construction arm of Israel's Histadrut.

I also attended a lively Kabalat Shabbat in a highrise apartment overlooking the Andes in Quito, where my Israeli host routinely invites both Jewish travellers and resident Christian Ecuadorians for a traditional Shabbat meal and explains the rituals and traditions of welcoming the Sabbath.

The gathering lasted well into the night and was a most unique and enjoyable experience.

My Hebrew came in very handy in Ecuador – and not just in Quito. A fair number of young sabras travel through South America, and one hears Hebrew spoken frequently in all the major tourist sites in the Andes.

At a small hotel in Banos I thought I recognized a familiar accent in English after giving my breakfast order to the front desk clerk. Sure enough, when I switched to Hebrew, the young Israeli I had heard, whose name was Rami, first did a double-take and then told me about his post-army travels and temporary stay in Ecuador. He hailed from Haifa, where I had lived before he was born.

In all the towns usually frequented by Israeli young people, signs in Hebrew have appeared in cafes, restaurants and even travel offices. There is at least one Israeli-owned hostel in Quito, called The Eden. I encountered no middle-aged Israelis travelling individually or in a group; nor did I hear any Hebrew in the rainforest, but it wouldn't have surprised me in the least.

Make Yourself at Home

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The audience at the Israeli Nephesh Theatre production of Make Yourself at Home, which played recently at Leah Posluns Theatre, understood its occasional Hebrew dialogue better than audiences in Israel.

This unusual compliment was paid by producer-director and former Torontonian Howard Rypp in a discussion with cast and audience following the play's one-night stand, Sept. 17.

It evoked unusual responses, including a complaint that the 65-minute play was too short for the money charged. ($18, $14 for seniors). Rypp suggested the patron eat double portions at the reception.

But mostly, the audience liked the light-hearted comedy and congratulated the company.

"The play, in mostly English as we did it here, is more effective with people on this side of the ocean than in Israel," Caspi said

A lot of the laughs come from Bahir's fractured English as an immigrant newly arrived in Israel. At the reception, the Russian-born and Israeli-raised actor spoke faultless English.

A JEWISH WESTERN? AND A MUSICAL YET!

It's hard to tell from the press releases and attractive promotional poster exactly what to make of the theatrical debut of Easy Lenny Lazmon and the Great Western Ascension, by Anton Piatigorsky.

Billed as "an Eastern-Western musical vaudeville," the production opens Oct. 10 at the Annex Theatre and runs to Nov. 1.

Piatigorsky comes recommended as the playwright responsible for The Kabbalistic Psychoanalysis of Adam R. Tzaddik, a previous production that won the Summerworks Prize and was reportedly "a huge hit."

Film Society: Under the spirited leadership of the inimitable Ethel Teitelbaum, the Toronto Jewish Film Society begins its fall season Oct. 18 with the fascinating 1976 French film Mr. Klein, directed by Joseph Losey and starring Alain Delon and Jeanne Moreau.

Robert Klein, a wealthy French Catholic art dealer, finds his comfortable existence in Nazi-occupied Paris turned upside down when he discovers that he has a namesake, a Jewish musician and resistance fighter, who implicates him as an anti-fascist and even as a Jew.

Art Gallery of Ontario, Jackman Hall, 317 Dundas St. W. 5 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. (limited seating available) $7.50. 924-6211.

The Society is also presenting, with the Italian Cultural Institute, a screening of The Righteous Enemy (see story by Sheldon Kirshner) (UK, 1987), a moving documentary about the little-known efforts of Italian soldiers and diplomats to protect 40,000 Jewish refugees during the Holocaust. $5, includes lecture, screening and reception. Israeli Film on TVO: The critically acclaimed Israeli-made film Out for Love ... Be Back Shortly airs Oct. 7 at 10 p.m. and again Oct. 11 at 10 p.m. on the TVO network.

Out for Love ... Be Back Shortly is an hour-long autobiographical documentary by filmmaker Dan Katzir, who records his own struggle to find love and meaning amid the daily reality of terror and hate. The film has won critical acclaim and was featured as part of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival last spring.

It won a Jury Award last year in Israel and has received wide critical acclaim.

Charendoff has done well for herself since moving to Los Angeles four years ago. She had a voice part (as Spot the Chicken) in the cartoon series 101 Dalmations and continues to be the voice of Batgirl in the animated TV series, Batman: The New Generation. She plays the lead female role in Inspector Gadget and can also be heard in the Ghostbusters cartoon series.

In addition, she plays a character in Rugrats, a movie opening this month in theatres, and in the upcoming Disney production The Little Mermaid, Part II, in which she is the voice of the mermaid's daughter.

Proud parents Lillian and Syd Charendoff of North York, were recently in Los Angeles to attend the high-profile premiere of Sabrina Goes to Rome. "Just to watch her going down that red carpet with all the cameras flashing—we just kvelled," says Lillian.

An alumna of Forest Hill Collegiate, Charendoff also sings — a talent that was obvious when she sang as a soloist years ago at the Adath Israel Synagogue, says her mother.

"They call her 'One-Take Tara,'" Lillian says. "She just seems to know what to do. She has an amazing range. She can be three or four characters in the same cartoon and no one can tell. She can do accents, babies, whatever's required. She's unbelievable."

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It was a bizarre chapter of the Holocaust, a glint of light in an otherwise dark landscape.

As Jews in the rest of Europe were rounded up and deported to German concentration camps in Poland, Jews in Italian-occupied areas of Yugoslavia, France and Greece were spared their lives.

Much to Germany's anger, Italian civilian and military officials saved Jews, and thus impeded the flow of the Final Solution. As a result, about 40,000 fewer Jews were murdered during World War II.

Given the fact that Italy was Germany's ally and fascist comrade-in-arms, this was quite an unexpected and amazing turn of events.

The Righteous Enemy, presented by the Toronto Jewish Film Society and the Italian Cultural Institute on Oct. 15 at 7:30 p.m. at the Leah Posluns Theatre, tells the little-known and dramatic story of this sporadic rescue effort.

The screening is taking place with the cooperation of Rick Bartolucci (the Liberal MPP for Sudbury), the Bloor Jewish Community Centre and the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Eighty-seven minutes in length, The Righteous Enemy was made by Joseph Rochlitz, whose father Imre, owes his life to Italian benevolence.

Imre Rochlitz, a Viennese Jew, fled to Zagreb, Croatia, after Germany annexed Austria. As newly independent Croatia was an anti-Semitic state aligned with Germany, Rochlitz fared no better in Zagreb. He was packed off to a Croatian concentration camp and put to work digging mass graves.

Barely surviving the ordeal, he was finally released thanks to an uncle's intervention. Armed with a special travel document, he travelled to Split, a town on the Adriatic coast under Italy's control.

The Italian governor in Split had standing orders to expel foreign-born Jews like Rochlitz, and deliver them to the Zagreb-based Ustashe regime. He balked, saying he would not give them up unless their physical security could be guaranteed. Since this was not possible, Jews like Rochlitz remained where they were, under the protection of the Italian authorities.

Later, the Italians sent Rochlitz and some 3,500 Jews in the vicinity to an internment camp. There they lived under tolerable conditions until Italy surrendered to the Allies in 1943 and the Germans swept in.

Having heard about his father's wartime odyssey, Joseph Rochlitz always wondered whether it was an isolated incident or part of a larger pattern of Italian assistance to Jews.

In The Righteous Enemy, an unusually gripping documentary featuring newsreel footage and interviews with Jewish survivors, former Italian government officials and an Israeli historian specializing in the subject, Rochlitz concludes that humanitarian impulses basically motivated Italy to help Jews in their hour of duress.

On the face of it, one must wonder why Italy defied Germany. Benito Mussolini, the Italian dictator, was no Judeophile, his Jewish mistress notwithstanding. In 1938, Italy passed the first of a series of draconian anti-Semitic laws which left Italian Jews as second-class citizens. It must be said, however, that Mussolini refused German entreaties to deport Italian Jews. That happened only after Germany occupied Italy.

Maintaining their humanity amid fierce German pressure, Italian governors, generals and diplomats in Yugoslavia, France and Greece blocked attempts to deport Jews.

"We are not at war with innocent people," one Italian official says. "We didn't share the German idea of eliminating the Jewish race," observes another.

These officials moved Jews out of harm's way by bureaucratic evasions and delays, and, in one astonishing case, by erecting a roadblock. In Grenoble, France, an Italian army commander forced Vichy police to release 100 Jews they had just arrested. And in Salonika, Greece, where the Germans managed to wipe out much of the Jewish population, the Italian consul issued false nationality documents to Jews.

One can be cynical about these exemplary acts of humanity. Perhaps the Italians who helped Jews feared that the axis powers would lose the war and they would be liable to severe punishment.

But judging by the compelling evidence in The Righteous Enemy, these Italians appeared to have acted on the basis of morality rather than expediency.

MS drugs raise income for Weizmann Institute

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Proceeds from the sale of two multiple sclerosis drugs, solar panels and coded cards for a satellite TV system are providing additional income to the Weizmann Institute of Science.

The revenue comes from a system of technology transfer that brings development money from companies for ideas which originate at the institute, said Weizmann vice-president, Prof. David Mirelman at a national and Toronto chapter board meeting of the Canadian society of the institute.

"A lot has to be done before a drug is developed," said Mirelman. "Investors form a start-up company, and then a pharmaceutical company steps in. This is the modern way of doing it. Last year we had several start-up companies who are pursuing larger corporations."

Mirelman is chair of the institute's YEDA Research and Development Company, which commercializes the inventions of Weizmann scientists.

The agents against multiple sclerosis have proved "very successful," he said. "They are not a cure, but they seem to prolong the time between relapses."

The inscription process by which coded cards can give access to a TV satellite system was developed at the Institute.

"Today we have royalties from every card and decoder for Sky Television, which is owned by Rupert Murdoch. Every time they change the code, we have more sales. It keeps everybody honest and makes money for us."

Working with private industry has its problems, he said. For example, the institute will not accept a deal which involves secrecy or rigid milestones in research or unethical commercialism, and will not license a whole field of products instead of a specific agent. Also, the Institute will accept no liability and must be alert to get the right amount of royalties.

The three-year Weizmann International Jubilee Endowment Fund campaign to double its endowment to $500 million (US) will be launched in Rehovot in November, said national chair H. Thomas Beck.

Plans are underway to kick off the campaign in Canada, Beck said. All endowment fund contributions in this period will be conservatively invested in Canada.

The Canadian society has undertaken to fund a Canadian Centre for Laser Research in line with its previous commitment to nuclear physics and solar energy.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

A. I get very frustrated trying to feed my 3-year-old. He loves something one day and hates it the next. What can I do?

A. This is very typical, not only for small children, but for adults as well. We may really feel like eating pizza today, but it may be the last thing we feel like eating tomorrow. Kids tend to go through phases where they love a food and want to eat virtually nothing else; then they move on to something new. Try not to get frustrated by this. It is quite typical.

Q. I have recently been told that my bad cholesterol is high. What dietary changes do I have to make to improve this?

A. The first thing you should do is look at reducing the amount of fat in your diet, particularly saturated fat, and also look at increasing fibre. Talk to your doctor or a dietitian about how to achieve this, and make sure you are clear about how the changes can best be incorporated into your diet to achieve maximum results.

Q. My family loves snacking on raisins. Are they a low-cal snack?

A. Two-thirds of a cup of raisins contains 300 calories and 0.5 grams of fat.

Slugger Hank Greenberg challenged Ruth's homer record

By PAULINE DUBKIN YEARWOOD
Chicago Jewish News

Sports

CHICAGO — "I always felt that Walter Briggs, owner of the Detroit Tigers, was almost pulling for me not to break Ruth's [home run] record, because it might mean $5,000 or $10,000 more in salary for me. Today, if a guy had a chance to break the record, they'd be publicizing him and making a folk hero out of him..."

So wrote Jewish sports legend Hank Greenberg in Hank Greenberg: The Story of My Life, the autobiography he was working on with sports-writer Ira Berkow at the time of his death in 1989.

Greenberg was referring to the 1938 season, when he hit 58 homers, coming close to breaking Babe Ruth's single-season record of 60.

Today, the public is "making folk heroes" and more out of the Cubs' Sammy Sosa and the St. Louis Cardinals' Mark McGwire during their race to overtake Maris' one-season record of 61 home runs, set in 1961. Maris broke Babe Ruth's record of 60, set in 1927. Both McGwire and Sosa have broken Maris' record.

But in 1938, there were some who found it an outrage that the Babe's record might be broken by a Jewish ballplayer – one who in 1934 had drawn great admiration from Jews and many non-Jews for refusing to play on Yom Kippur during a close pennant race.

Looking back on his career, the man who was called "Hammerin' Hank" wrote: "Sure, there was added pressure being Jewish. How the hell could you get up to home plate every day and have some son of a bitch call you a Jew bastard and a kike and a sheenie and get on you...without feeling the pressure? If the ballplayers weren't doing it, the fans were."

Greenberg didn't take such slurs passively, especially from fellow ballplayers. In his book Ellis Island to Ebbets Field: Sport and the American Jewish Experience, Peter Levine recounts that during the summer of 1938, an unnamed Chicago White Sox player called Greenberg a "yellow Jew son of a bitch" during a game.

After the game, Greenberg entered the White Sox clubhouse and demanded that the player "come here and call me that to my face." No one moved.

Literature and legend are replete with similar stories, some of which end with Greenberg dropping the offending player with a single smack to the jaw.

The two-time MVP also believed that "being Jewish did carry with it a special responsibility. After all, I was representing a couple of million Jews among a hundred million gentiles, and I was always in the spotlight."

By 1938, he said he had come to feel that "if I, as a Jew, hit a home run, I was hitting one against Hitler."

Suspense built during that fateful season when, with five games left to go, Greenberg already had hit 58 home runs, closing in on the Babe's record.

Hank Greenberg

During the next four games, however, Greenberg went without a homer. Then came the final game of the season, against the Cleveland Indians. The crowd was both tense and excited. Fans realized it wasn't impossible for Greenberg at least to tie the record, since he had hit two home runs in 11 different games that season.

By the seventh inning, he had hit three singles and walked once. At that point, in the days before ballpark lights, the game was called because of darkness. As Greenberg describes it in his book: "It really shouldn't have lasted that long. But the umpire was George Moriarty, my friend. I know that he wanted me to have every possible chance at the Babe's record. After the seventh inning, Moriarty said to me, 'I'm sorry, Hank. But this is as far as I can go.'

"I said, 'That's all right, George, this is as far as I can go, too.'"

Would Greenberg have had a better chance to break Ruth's record if his name had been Grayson, or, for that matter, McGwire? Levine writes that some members of his family, as well as some Jewish fans, "remained convinced that Hank's assault on the Babe's record was undermined by anti-Semitic pitchers who refused to give their hero a decent pitch to hit."

The hero himself thoroughly denied that notion, writing in his autobiography that "some people still have it fixed in their minds that the reason I didn't break Ruth's record was because I was Jewish, that the ballplayers did everything they could to stop me. That's pure baloney. The fact is quite the opposite: So far as I could tell, the players were mostly rooting for me, aside from the pitchers."

His own explanation for the failure to break the record is that he was never in Ruth's class as a home-run hitter. "I averaged around 35 (home runs)," he wrote, "so this was just a freak season for me."

His real goal, he related, was always to break Lou Gehrig's record of 184 RBIs. He came close to accomplishing that feat in 1937 when he had 183 RBIs, just short of that record, too.

From the vantage point of 60 years, we may never know just how much anti-Semitism figured in Greenberg's failure to break Ruth's record, says Steven Riess, a history professor at Northeastern Illinois University and author of Sports and the American Jew.

"We know there was lots of anti-Semitism in baseball in those days, and the players would probably just as soon he not break the record," he said. "But then, they didn't want anyone to break that record."

On the other hand, he says, Greenberg seemed to have had "relatively decent chances" to homer during the last five games of the season, including one game during which pitching great Bob Feller struck out 18 players. Another time, says Riess, Greenberg hit the ball off the roof but it went foul.

"I wasn't there, so I don't know, but [Greenberg] seemed to be a pretty honest guy, and he himself didn't feel that he didn't get a fair shake," Riess concludes.

Anti-Semitic incidents spur kayaker to win races

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Incidents of Jewish athletes encountering overt anti-Semitism on the playing field can't yet be consigned to the dustbins of history.

For Vancouver kayaker Dari Fisher, 20, being taunted by anti-Semites bent on distracting him from a top performance, is an event of recent vintage.

Three years ago, at the national kayaking championship in Welland, Ont., several opponents held him down and tried to intimidate him prior to an important race. Some of them insulted him with taunts of "dirty Jew."

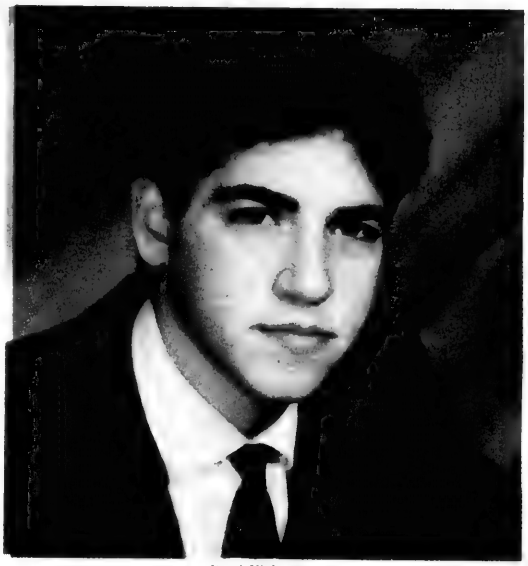
Then, just this past August at the Canadian National Sprint Canoe and Kayaking Championship in Whistler, B.C., "the same guys from Welland started lightly kicking my boat. This time around, it wasn't anything religiously related, but there's a history there," Fisher said.

Instead of getting into an ugly altercation, the 6-foot-3, 200-pound Fisher chose a different path. With a bronze medal already in hand after the 500-metre K-1 (one-man kayak) race, he went on to finish third in the 200-metre sprint. It was his way of responding to his detractors and showing them their intimidation didn't slow him down. In fact, it helped motivate him to work harder and finish higher.

"I preferred to deal with it my own way," Fisher explained. "It bothers them more if you just go out and do your thing and beat them in the races."

Dari's brother Nuri, 17, had a different approach, trading verbal insults with the others while challenging them to settle the matter right then and there, but the others "backed down," Dari said.

As far as he's concerned, exposure to anti-Semitism "spurred me on to work harder. I'd go on the water and think to myself, 'that guy's an anti-Semite and I'm going to kick his butt'. I'm good at getting the last laugh."



Dari Fisher

In the past few years, Fisher's been working hard to make sure he gets the last laugh. Under the supervision of Imre Kemeesey, a world-renowned kayaking coach from Hungary, the young kayaker maintains a grueling training regimen that would test the mettle of a lesser athlete. During the winter, he's in his boat three times a week in the shallow waters of Burnaby Lake in suburban Vancouver, paddling four hours at a time. The long workouts build endurance, he said. On three other days of the week, Fisher either runs or is in the pool, swimming. He supplements all that aerobic activity with a weight program.

In May, Fisher resumes sprint paddling, giving himself an aerobic workout in preparation for the summer's shorter races. He's on the water 10 to 11 times per week, each workout averaging one-and-a-half hours.

"In shallow water, the boat is not that fast compared to deep water. In deep water, you can go much faster. It's awesome," he said.

So far, all that tough training has paid off. Four years ago, Fisher finished 11th in the K-1 500 metre race at the Canadian championships.

But since he last spoke to The CJN following a double gold medal performance in 1000-metre and 200-metre K-4 races in Welland, "everything has improved, my endurance, my speed," he said.

Earlier this year, at the national qualifiers in British Columbia, he won just about everything. That included top finishes in 200-, 500- and 1000-metre K-1 races and first place finishes in the 200-, 500- and 1000-metre races in the K-2 boat.

Despite the victories working with another paddler, Fisher says "I prefer the singles now... You're the man, you have to completely rely on yourself. On the flip side, if you don't do well, it's your own fault."

It also means he's had to scramble to find corporate sponsors to underwrite some of his costs. It's not exactly part of the sport but it's a necessity. He's still looking.

Meanwhile, Kemeesey has helped Fisher develop the mental aspects of the sport, along with the physical. He's helped him stay "process oriented," not "goal oriented," Fisher said. Instead of worrying about how high he'll finish, he concentrates on his paddling technique, keeping his emotions channeled,he said.

"Kayaking is a controlled aggression sport," Fisher said. "It's very tactical. You have to be thinking how much energy you have left and maintaining technique and consistency."

With his ascent to near the top of Canadian kayaking, Fisher now has his sights set on the national team and a spot in the Pan Am Games next summer in Winnipeg. The Canadian team consists of paddlers with the top six times in single races, leaving him in good shape to make the team.

The Inside Back

About families

Dear Susan,

My 11-year-old daughter is caught up with the Clinton scandal. While she is a very bright girl, we are unsure about how much media exposure we should allow her to get on this so..lid business. What do you suggest ?

Dear Reader,

Many years ago, our only form of non-direct contact was correspondence by mail. Today of course, we can send and receive information on a worldwide basis instantly via television, fax and the Internet. The immediacy of information creates a quandary for responsible parents – how does one slow things down in order to evaluate whether information is a help or a hindrance to your child? In a sense, the media has usurped the parents' right to censor sensitive material.

I am all for slowing down and tailoring it to the needs of your child. You have an 11-year-old who is bright, but who is still a child. She is in a developmental stage in which she engages in concrete thinking and in assessing the world in terms of polar opposites. She still plays both judge and jury.

In discussing the specifics of Bill Clinton's behavior, you will certainly want as much as possible to avoid the salacious details. Rather than get into those details, you may want to speak about the failure to tell the truth and the betrayal of trust that all seem to agree that Clinton is guilty of. Clinton's transgressions can be discussed in the context of the family, and can be an opportunity to discuss with your child the importance of the truth. If nothing else, Clinton's dilemma demonstrates that lying for the short-term gain can result in serious long-term pain. The importance of trust and integrity can also be discussed, and the deep and sometimes permanent effects of betraying the trust of someone who loves and believes in you.

It may be impossible for you to avoid the ugly details, since they seem to be plastered over all the media. If you have not begun the process of educating your child on matters of sexuality, you may find yourself in the position of having to do so. If your child has received a sexual education, you will want to assure her that the behavior of the president does not represent the normal, loving sexual behavior that all mature adults should exhibit.

Finally, the Clinton episode is a key example of a fundamental principle that we all try to teach our children – behavior has consequences. Acting for short-term pleasure, without regard for the consequences, is a recipe for disaster. Even the most powerful man in the world cannot act irresponsibly and get away with it.

Assisting the Vulnerable

Ask Evelyn Rabkin.

None of us ever knows where life's journey will take us. So it was for Evelyn Rabkin, a hardworking mother and wife from Montréal.

Evelyn's ambitions were fulfilled in Montréal through her job at Jewish Vocational Services, her loving marriage, and her sons. Yet, for economic reasons, the Rabkins decided to relocate in Toronto.

The move to Toronto was depressing. "We would go from one mall to another, hang around, and wait for our children to come home," Evelyn recalls.

With the discovery of the Bernard Betel Centre, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, hope swept the Rabkins toward a new path. Evelyn and her husband began enjoying life like newlyweds. Unfortunately, the couple's newfound joy was painfully brief. Evelyn's husband suddenly died. Panic-stricken by grief and faced with the frightening need for a hip replacement, she once again turned to Bernard Betel for friendship and counseling.

Now, Evelyn's life has come full circle. Her strength has returned; she is active again at the Centre and she has met a wonderful man—Ed Yuditsky—whom she plans to marry!

Like Evelyn, thousands of elderly in the Greater Toronto Area will benefit from the Campaign for Fifty, through $4.3 million in new funds to assist the vulnerable. These additional dollars will support, among other programs, expanded home care and out-reach to seniors; increased assistance to Toronto's Jewish poor and more counseling for victims of family violence.

Israel, PA near agreement

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

A series of intelligence warnings that Hamas terror attacks are imminent is providing the best proof that Israel and the Palestinians are near an agreement.

Analysis

Further proof is also coming from right-wing members of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's coalition, who have renewed their threats to bring down the government if the premier agrees to transfer additional West Bank lands to the Palestinians.

But despite the flurry of diplomatic activity surrounding U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright's recent visit to the Middle East, visits by Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat last month to New York and Washington, and the upcoming summit in Maryland, there are still plenty of skeptics who doubt that a deal will be concluded.

Vandals strike Jewish sites

By RON CSILLAG
DAVID LAZARUS
and PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporters

Three attacks on Jewish targets in Canada in one week have left officials shaken, but confident the offences are not part of a trend.

Two of the attacks are being treated as crimes of hate against Jews.

Arson investigators are busy with two incidents, one in Ottawa and the other in Toronto.

A fire that caused up to $75,000 damage at Ecole Maimonides in suburban Ottawa is not even close to being solved. There have been no arrests and police have few leads. Although it was arson and it occurred hours after Yom Kippur ended, the blaze is not being treated as hate-motivated.

In downtown Toronto, a fire on Sukkot at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC) was deliberately set. Police say the blaze, which caused at least $10,000 in damage, was a hate crime.

And in Montreal, vandals broke into a private home over Yom Kippur, did thousands of dollars in damage and scrawled anti-Semitic messages on walls.

"To the best of our knowledge to date, we are not aware of any connection between the three," said Mark Weintraub, national chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress community relations committee.

"We are proceeding on the basis that these were ugly, anti-Semitic attacks, but [that] they are not related," he said.

Weintraub said that because two of the attacks were hate-driven, he expects they will be given high priority.

On Sept. 30, Simon Bohbot, his wife Jocelyne, and their children Miriam, Benjamin and Jessica returned home after observing Yom Kippur and Miriam's 15th birthday, and were appalled to discover the destruction inside.

According to Police Constable Valerie Fradet, the vandalism appeared to be a hate crime with no precedent in the area.

Major areas of interior walls were covered with large-lettered anti-Semitic and obscene graffiti; rugs, furs and furniture were spray-painted and soiled by finishing stain; expensive basement furniture was ripped to shreds; and jewelry and electronic equipment were missing.

The walls also were defaced with what looked like two satanic pentagrams – one piece of graffiti

Bombs Kill Two

JERUSALEM — Two roadside bombs in southern Lebanon killed two Israeli soldiers and wounded six others last week. Hezbollah claimed responsibility for the attack, which occurred inside Israel's security zone.

Clashes and Strike

HEBRON — Israeli troops clashed with Palestinian stone-throwers in this West Bank city last week, as Arab residents observed a general strike to protest a week-long curfew imposed by Israel after a Palestinian threw a grenade at Israeli troops. Israel kept the West Bank and Gaza Strip sealed off.

Ariel To Become City

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is planning to designate the West Bank settlement of Ariel as a city. A spokesperson for Netanyahu called the move a "technical thing" and denied that it was a provocative act.

WORLD

Gunman Kills Four

BAGHDAD — Four people – two Jews and two Muslims – were killed last Sunday when a gunman entered a synagogue in a local community centre and sprayed it with bullets.

The Babylonian Jewish Heritage organization said a man burst into the synagogue during preparations for Sukkot, and went on a shooting spree.

"We place full responsibility for the act on the president of Iraq," a statement from the Jewish community said.

The Iraqi cabinet, in a meeting chaired by President Saddam Hussein, condemned the incident. A cabinet statement said a Palestinian born in Kuwait was responsible for the murders. The statement also said that he had been arrested and would be put on trial.

The two Muslims were reportedly in the synagogue to pay rent for properties belonging to the community.

Gorby, Shamir Attend Fete

NEW YORK — A gala Israel Bonds celebration marking the 10th anniversary of the opening of the gates of Soviet Jewish emigration to Israel will feature former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev and former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir. The event will take place Oct. 25 at the New York Hilton, and will bring together 23 leaders of the Soviet Jewry movement from all over North America, including Toronto's Wendy Eisen.

Looted Art

SAO PAULO — A commission created by Brazil's justice ministry is using leads supplied by the World Jewish Congress to search for more than 100 artworks believed to have been plundered by the Nazis and sold in Brazil. In addition, two artworks – oil paintings by Claude Monet and Pablo Picasso – have been placed under the protection of the Special Commission to Examine the Nazi Legacy in Brazil.

Calls from Congress

WASHINGTON — Forty-five members of the U.S. Congress called on Germany to investigate what they say are abuses in that country's restitution program for Holocaust survivors. The representatives called on newly elected German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder to look into cases where survivors "have received offers well below what they deserved, or even were rejected outright."

Smith Elected VP

Scoops of Tsuris for Ben & Jerry's

WASHINGTON — The conflict in the Middle East has given Ben & Jerry's several chilly licks recently. Under a hail of protest from anti-settler groups, the ice cream manufacturer's Israeli franchise cancelled a contract last month to purchase water from Mei Eden, a mineral water company based in the Golan Heights, to make sorbet.

But some Jewish organizations consider the move to break the contract and to endorse calls for boycotting certain Israeli products a slap in the face of the peace process.

The president of the Zionist Organization of America, Morton Klein, said Jewish entrepreneurs Ben Cohen and Jerry Greenfield have sent a message to all Jewish businesses to boycott Israel.

Criticism of Mei Eden began in September 1997, after an Israeli group, Gush Shalom, urged consumers to boycott goods produced in Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and in the Golan. The group published a list of Israeli companies, including Mei Eden, that operate in those areas.

Perry Odak, the chief executive officer of Ben & Jerry's, was inundated with letters and e-mails criticizing the company after the Mei Eden contract was revealed in Israeli newspapers in June.

Rabbi Plaut to head committee that will disburse Swiss funds

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Gunther Plaut has been appointed to chair the Canadian committee that will disburse money from the humanitarian fund set up by Swiss banks last year to help needy Holocaust survivors.

Roughly $2.5 million (US) from the $185 million fund has been allocated to Canada.

Studies consistently show that in Canada, one in six Jews lives below the poverty line, and that one-third of all Jewish poor are over 65.

An Oct. 1 press release issued by the national office of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) said the committee will include representatives from CJC, United Israel Appeal Federations Canada, and Holocaust survivors groups.

But Rabbi Plaut told The CJN last week that "all that is out the window.

"I want this to be non-organizational and non-partisan. We will start from scratch."

He said the committee will probably include representatives from United Israel Appeal, but the "majority" of members will be Holocaust survivors.

"This is a very sensitive matter for survivors. A lot of ancient pain will be brought up," Rabbi Plaut said. "And how we will pick them [for the committee] will be difficult."

He said that in the coming weeks, he will be calling various community organizations to canvass prospective committee members.

So far, no one has been appointed, he noted.

He said the committee will have to determine who will receive compensation, and who will be turned down. One of its tasks will be to define needy.

"It will be a difficult and sensitive job."

According to CJC, the committee will establish criteria for eligibility, the handling of claims, and the disbursement of funds, either directly to needy survivors or to communal social welfare programs, or a combination of both.

The Swiss humanitarian fund is unrelated to the $1.25 billion (US) settlement reached in August between Swiss banks and class-action claimants to dormant war-era accounts. CJC estimates there are about 100 survivors in Canada with valid claims against Swiss banks.

In the United States, an estimated 120,000 survivors are eligible to receive compensation from the humanitarian fund. A toll-free telephone number has been set up south of the border.

When the Swiss humanitarian fund was announced last spring, CJC estimated that individual payouts will likely not exceed $1,000.

Standing by for rescue

Last week, the finance ministers and central bankers from 182 countries convened in Washington at the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) to discuss the swirling global economic crisis.

After five days of debate, no fiscal or monetary remedies were adopted. No coordinated plans were endorsed. The mood in Washington was decidedly pessimistic, as it has been now, for some months.

The electronically wired, interdependent, inter-related, worldwide economy is having problems.

During the heyday of the Cold War era, people spoke of the "domino effect." The current economic global crisis gives new meaning to that term.

At home, the Canadian dollar, relative to the American dollar, has experienced its lowest value ever, despite the fact that, as all economists agree, the "fundamentals" of Canada's economy are inherently sound.

Investors around the world ride stock markets as if on an unending roller coaster, falling and rising in a steep financial vertigo each day.

Abroad, entire macro-economies of different countries have buckled, calamitously, upheaving with them their respective social and civic order. Indonesia was a prime example.

Russia is another.

A recent Dry Bones cartoon succinctly captured the Russian predicament by punning ruble into rubble. The cartoon evoked a wry smile; but in truth, the situation is not one for laughter. It is fraught with danger.

Severe economic stresses have precipitated even more severe social stresses. We all saw the scenes on television and in the newspaper of frightened and angry people scrounging, begging for their own money at their empty banks.

As expected, social stresses rippled into political stresses, which the fledgling, immature, corruption-riven, free market Russian democracy could not seamlessly absorb.

On Sept. 11, Boris Yeltsin "surrendered" to an alliance of old-line communist ideologues and new-line communist pragmatists by appointing Yevgeny Primakov to the post of prime minister.

No one yet knows what substantive policy changes Primakov and his cadre will bring about. We can only speculate based upon what we do know about them.

Prof. Aurel Braun of the University of Toronto, an expert on Russia, recently described Primakov in The CJN as "rabidly anti-Semitic and anti-Israel." Braun envisions an immediate to near future in Russia characterized by "some form of authoritarian mix of both extreme right and the communists."

The ongoing upheavals in Russia, Braun said, could lead to a "toxic mix" of anti-Semitism from both the far right and the far left communists.

Jews around the world are worried. History has been our teacher, and memory the chalkboard on which history's lessons have been inscribed. In Russia, those memories have been of merciless scapegoating. And the lesson they have taught us is to be wary.

Jewish "rescue" organizations are on call, primed, ready to step in as the need arises.

Last week, across my desk, I received an urgent memo from UIA Federations Canada reporting on a conference call that community leaders had with Dr. Baruch Gur, director general of Keren Hayesod.

Gur provided an update on the situation in Russia. No one is more qualified to have done so. The author of Open Gates, The Inside Story of the Mass Aliya from the Soviet Union and its Successor States, Gur was in Russia, on the very streets of Moscow, as Yeltsin ordered tanks to fire upon the Duma.

From his offices in Jerusalem, Gur said the following: "This is a major political and economic crisis. The situation is that many people have lost a great deal of money. However, what is more frightening for them is that they have also lost their political influence. The middle class has lost the most. The middle class Jews are not able to liquidate their assets right now."

If the economic situation does not stabilize, Gur anticipates that there will be a marked increase in aliyah in six to 12 months.

He reported that there was a small increase in the number of Jews leaving the former Soviet Union (FSU) last month compared with previous Septembers. There was also a small increase in the number of professionals, aged 20 to 45, enrolling in ulpan Hebrew classes in Moscow and St. Petersburg.

"What is important to note is that this is not the regular crowd at the Jewish Agency offices. These people are professionals. They were banking on a secure future and had bought homes in the FSU. Now, they have seen their lives destroyed in a single second." (Our emphasis)

Having regard to the fact that the devaluation in the ruble and the hyper-inflation have affected everyone's ability to buy food, Gur also warned that "the number of hungry will be increasing."

In a short few weeks, as the dreaded Russian winter descends upon the people, the situation will be even worse.

There has not yet been any marked increase in anti-Semitic activities, Gur noted. However, as the situation deteriorates, he predicted the Jews will inevitably be blamed.

He did not need to tell us that. But he did emphatically add that whatever happens in Russia over the next few months, the Jewish Agency will be able to bring to Israel each and every Jew who wishes to go there.

Holocaust bill closer to passage

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario is about to become the first province in Canada to officially mark an annual Holocaust memorial day.

A private member's bill sponsored by Ted Chudleigh (PC – Halton North) calls for Ontario to "proclaim Holocaust Memorial Day – Yom Hashoah in Ontario" each year.

Bill 66 calls for the day to be observed on Yom Hashoah, in accordance with the Jewish calendar.

The bill passed second reading last Thursday with no opposition. It now heads to committee and then to third and final reading.

The bill is not expected to encounter opposition, and will likely become law well before the next Yom Hashoah in April.

Last Thursday's second reading, considered the most important of the three, saw probably the most extensive and emotional discussion of the Holocaust and its importance ever in Ontario's legislature.

MPPs from all parties rose to speak of the importance of Holocaust commemoration and of educating future generations about the perils of racism and hatred. Some MPPs choked with emotion.

Chudleigh said the bill would provide "an opportunity to reflect on and educate about the enduring lessons of the Holocaust. This day shall also provide an opportunity to consider other instances of systemic destruction of peoples, human rights and the multicultural reality of modern society."

Atonement

Liberal David Caplan slammed the government for cutting anti-racism programs from school curricula, and said teaching the Holocaust should be "entrenched" in school courses.

The NDP's Peter Kormos said Holocaust Memorial Day will "celebrate the courage of survivors." He reminded the legislature that the Allies, including Canada, "did too little" for Jews in wartime Europe.

"We have some atonement to do for those who died at the hands of the Nazis and their collaborators," he said.

Kormos assailed "those who dare to deny" the Holocaust.

Attorney General Charles Harnick, the only Jewish member of the government, said Ontario has been paying annual tribute to Holocaust survivors since 1991. Harnick had to cut his remarks short after he choked on his words.

Several MPPs mentioned other examples of genocide, such as the 1915 massacre of Armenians by Turkey, and today's ethnic crisis in the Balkans.

But they all agreed the Holocaust was unique in its extent and brutality. Tory Lillian Ross pointed out that 1.5 million children were murdered by the Nazis, while New Democrat Tony Martin simply wondered, "How could this have happened?"

Liberal Mike Colle said he finds the day significant "because we cannot let six million [Jews] die in vain."

Chudleigh told The CJN he introduced the bill because he views the Holocaust as among history's "major events."

He said he has a link to the era. His wife's aunt was deported to a Nazi concentration camp and was never heard from again.

Chudleigh's initiative won praise from Keith Landy, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, who also called it a possible way to introduce Holocaust education in Ontario schools.

Holocaust Education Week marks 'chai' anniversary

TORONTO — Holocaust Education Week, an annual program of education and remembrance, will include 96 events this year at a variety of locations in the greater Toronto area.

Lectures, panel discussions, films, plays, poetry readings and exhibitions will be held in synagogues, churches, libraries, community centres and other venues.

The "week," which runs this year from Oct. 29 to Nov. 9, was inaugurated in 1980 with a handful of events, said Howard Driman, chair of Holocaust Education Week 1998. To the best of organizers' knowledge, it is the largest event of its kind in the world.

"The need to teach the lessons of the Holocaust appears more and more relevant as we witness recent events around the world. The best way to counter anti-Semitism, neo-Nazism, Holocaust denial, racism, bigotry and indifference is surely through education," he said.

This year is particularly significant for organizers. Not only is it the 18th anniversary of Holocaust Education Week, it is 60 years since Kristallnacht (the "Night of Shattered Glass" in Germany and Austria) and the 50th anniversary of both the creation of the State of Israel and the United Nations' Declaration on Human Rights.

Opening night, to be held at the Leah Posluns Theatre, will feature

Howard Driman

Ernest Michel, a Holocaust survivor, author, lecturer and former CEO of New York's UJA-Federation who was imprisoned in several concentration camps and eventually escaped from a death march. He covered the Nuremberg Trials for the German press, and worked briefly as a journalist on arriving in the United States. He will give a personal reflection of the 60 years since Kristallnacht.

Other programs include the first Toronto appearance of Daniel Jonah Goldhagen, author of Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust; the film Not in Our Town highlighting the efforts of Billings, Mont. residents to combat local hate crimes, to be followed by a panel discussion with the former Billings police chief, the head of the hate crimes unit of the Greater Toronto Area, and Salome Bey of People Against Racism; and German-born Ursula Duba, author of Tales from a Child of the Enemy.

Montreal professor Gabrielle Tyrnauer will discuss the experiences of the Roma during the war; award-winning filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici will talk of the "hidden history" of the Jews; psychologist Alan Bardikoff will address How and When to Talk to your Children about the Holocaust; Bonnie Gurewitsch of New York's Jewish Heritage Museum will discuss "camp sisters" (the unique kinship of women in concentration camps); and John Schuchman, a professor at Gallaudet University, will discuss issues relating to deaf people in the Holocaust. The latter program will be conducted in spoken English and sign language.

The closing event will be a community commemoration of Kristallnacht at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. Keynote speaker will be Gerda Steinitz-Freiberg, founder of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto and past president, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

For further information, call the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto, 635-2883, ext. 301.

Survivors, offspring gather at Yad Vashem memorial

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Some 200 people, most of them survivors and their offspring, recently gathered at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial at Earl Bales Park in North York for a memorial service.

"Most of these people don't have a cemetery to go to. This is the place where they can come to feel closest, to remember their loved ones, said Marilyn Somers, executive director of the Canadian Society of Yad Vashem.

The ceremony began with the march of the honor guard, which was made up of members of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada.

"This monument is a grim reminder of what human beings are capable of doing – man's inhumanity to man," Eisen told the group

"We, the children of survivors, are charged with reviving the conscience of the world," Rabbi Shulman said.

The service included the lighting of six memorial candles to symbolize the six million Jews who were murdered. Participants in this ceremony included Mr. and Mrs Hank Rosenbaum, Jack Muscat, Herman Gottesman and Frank Dimant.

Alex Eisen, a member of the board of Yad Vashem and a Holocaust survivor, was the MC. Rabbi Moshe Shulman and Cantor Yaacov Motzen of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue led the service, while Attorney General Charles Harnick, a former Yad Vashem board member, led the group in the singing of O Canada.

The representatives of six community organizations – Beth David B'Nai Israel Beth Am, Beth Tzedec, B'nai Brith Canada, The Reena Foundation, The Ostrovtzer Society, and the Jewish War Veterans of Canada – laid six wreaths in memory of the six million.

Helen Rosenbaum (centre) and her husband Hank, the chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, light a memorial candle. They are assisted by Marilyn Somers, the society's executive director.

Jewish veterans honor fallen comrades

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Veterans wearing blue blazers and berets with the Star of David marched double file through Mount Sinai Cemetery behind a color guard of their peers and a bagpiper in military dress, at a recent memorial service honoring Canadian Jewish soldiers who died in active duty during World War II.

They were saluted by military dignitaries on a reviewing stand, as they made their way to the Jewish War Veterans cenotaph erected 20 years ago.

The veterans, along with such dignitaries as Minister of Defence Art Eggleton, Attorney General Charles Harnick, Police board chair Norm Gardner, Brig.-Gen. E. Gosden, Israeli Deputy Consul Irit Waldergorn and Jewish War Veterans of Canada commanders Hy Shulman and Sam Pasternack, were among the 200 people who attended the annual service, which has been held at the cenotaph for the last 20 years under the auspices of the General Wingate Branch 256 of the Royal Canadian Legion.

The service takes place every year between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, memorial service chair Murray Jacobs told the assembled group.

He noted the service is also a time to remember comrades who returned from war and are no longer alive.

Sam Romberg, president of the Wingate Branch, told the group he hopes "younger members will carry on and not let them be forgotten."

Eggleton said, "The High Holy Days are an appropriate occasion to remember those who have sacrificed their lives. We all owe [them] a debt of gratitude."

Some 17,000 Canadian Jews served in the Canadian forces during World War II, while approximately 4,500 Canadian Jews served in the Canadian expeditionary force, Eggleton said.

He said the sacrifices of those who were killed have enabled Canadians to enjoy democracy. It is still necessary, however, to be vigilant, he said, and that is why Canada contributes to peace-keeping.

Rabbi Aaron Zimmerman made the benediction for the memorial service, and Cantor Saul Carr led the K'El Maleh Rachamim, Kaddish, Hatikvah and the national anthems.

The service also included the reading of the more than 400 names inscribed on the cenotaph.

Among the people participating in a wreath-laying ceremony was Coleman Bernstein, who lost a brother during the war.

Two members of General Wingate, Jerry Rosenberg and Harold Kates, who fought in the Israel War of Independence, laid wreaths on behalf of the other branch members who were also in the Palmach.

The Last Post and reveille were sounded by the bugler, and the piper played The Lament. RCAF veteran Roy Waisberg blew the shofar.

After the singing of Hatikvah and God Save the Queen, the color guard led the veterans and dignitaries to the small building at the entrance of the cemetery for a reception prepared and organized by the Women's Auxiliary of the General Wingate Branch.

Summit hopes

These words are being written before the summit meeting scheduled for today, Oct. 15, in Wye Plantation, Md., of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Palestine Authority President Yasser Arafat and U.S. President Bill Clinton. Truth to say, the summit came about somewhat unexpectedly, the positive outcome of two days of productive meetings last week between Madeleine Albright, U.S. Secretary of State, and the two Middle East leaders, at the border of Gaza and Israel.

Israeli media even described the exchanges between Netanyahu and Arafat as "remarkable conviviality," at the end of which the two men ate together for the first time in Palestinian territory.

Albright told reporters that the parties had made "significant and substantial progress on the further redeployment, security, the Gaza industrial estate and the airport, formation of an anti-incitement committee and activation of people-to-people programs." She paid special tribute to the co-operation between Netanyahu and Arafat. "This new spirit was very helpful, and I hope very much that it will be carried on in Washington," Albright added.

Albright's meetings with Netanyahu and Arafat were the continuation of the discussions the two men held with Clinton last month in the United States.

Following the Jimmy Carter precedent at Camp David, Clinton is expected to sit shoulder-to-shoulder with Netanyahu and Arafat trying to cobble together the final pieces of the next phase of the Oslo peace structure. As Albright noted, "The president is going to be very much involved in a lot of the detailed work."

Given the way that such high-profile, high-stakes international summit meetings are usually arranged, and the costly public backlash that would result from the failure to fulfil the accompanying highly pegged public expectations, one could normally assume that most of the "detailed work" has already been done.

But, as history has shown, there has been very little of the "usual" or of the "normal" in the relations between Israel and the Palestinians.

Even as Netanyahu and Arafat were effusively shaking hands and posing together with rare warmth and congeniality, some veteran, typically acerbic – some might say realistic – Israeli commentators were downplaying the significance of the meetings concluded in Gaza and the meetings upcoming in Maryland.

"Despite all the media fuss, no real progress was made in the key disputed issues: the security issue and the third redeployment issue, which are at the heart of the arguments," Yoni Ben-Menachem declared on Israel Radio.

The Labor party publicly disdained the prime minister's efforts while still promising to support any agreement he achieves with the Palestinians.

But the loudest, most vociferous restraining sounds directed at the prime minister emanated from his right-wing supporters and coalition partners. The National Religious Party (NRP) forcefully outlined their "red lines" to him last week threatening to topple the coalition government if the red lines are crossed. After meeting with the prime minister however, NRP leaders were somewhat assuaged.

Still, there is room for some optimism. One might even add there is an obligation to hope for a good outcome from the unfolding events. The appearance of forward movement can create momentum for more; even as the appearance of collegiality and cooperation can create the beginnings of trust.

The differences between the two sides can be bridged. The question is: will there be the desire and the courage to do so? We know for Clinton's part, there will be. He will be working earnestly to ensure success at Wye Plantation to offset the daily barrage of negative news arising from the impeachment investigations. For Arafat's part, he must, once and for all, reject the ambiguities and the prevarications that have become his trademark. And Netanyahu must, once and for all, stare down the extremists in his coalition, the blackmailers and the extortionists who have become his and the country's millstone.

Judaism in Toronto belies MK's comments

Two jarring headlines on opposite pages confronted the reader of your pre-Sukkot edition (Oct. 1) – "MKs slam Reform, Conservative movements" and "Orthodox conversion only acceptable process: rabbi." I have great respect for Orthodox conversion and deep connections in the Orthodox community, which I cherish. I am also aware of ongoing negotiations in Israel between the streams on the conversion issue that are heading in a positive direction, largely because the deliberations are out of the media limelight. Thus, I was distressed to read that two MKs chose to criticize the Conservative and Reform movements on a visit to Canada, returning this issue to public divisive debate.

MKs Weinberg and Dahan object to the Conservative and Reform movements having pursued Supreme Court challenges to the Orthodox conversion monopoly, because, in so doing, they have "let 'a very dangerous genie' out of the bottle," and have violated the religious status quo.

There is no question but that the court cases challenge the "status quo."

But reading on in the article, one learns that "they [Reform and Conservative Jews] can practise their faith freely in Israel." True, they are not arrested for attending services. But most would assume that religious freedom would include the right of having one's own rabbi officiate at his or her wedding or funeral, clearly not the case for members of Masorti (Conservative) or Mitkademet (Reform) congregations in Israel.

The religious "status quo" in Israel needs fixing desperately. It is not only the non-Orthodox movements that stand to benefit, but the many secular Israelis who are turning their backs on Judaism as well, who likely would respond better to a more diverse religious playing field.

I would have encouraged the visiting MKs to take a closer look at Jewish life in Toronto, where a non-monopolistic Judaism functions rather well.

Jews can (and do) choose the type of synagogue they wish to attend, and streams are free to promote their "versions" of Judaism in an open marketplace. My (Conservative) congregants often receive mailings and solicitations from Orthodox and Reform organizations and institutions. Sometimes they respond by making financial contributions. Sometimes they respond by attending lectures, seminars and other activities. Sometimes, they don't respond.

This is a sign of health, the result of an open religious marketplace. When congregants of mine are drawn to another approach, to the left or to the right, I respect their choice and admire the seriousness with which they approach their Jewish life. When Jews from other streams gravitate to my congregation, I am happy to welcome them, but refuse to disparage the stream from which they have travelled.

An open religious marketplace works well in North America. (Yes, there is assimilation, but don't assume that the absence of Reform, Reconstructionist and Conservative congregations would lead every Jew to Orthodoxy. European countries with negligible non-Orthodox communities have astronomical intermarriage rates.) Israel would benefit greatly from true religious choice. A status-quo that enforces a religious monopoly is an injustice that must be undone.

I remain strongly opposed to efforts to criminalize or otherwise delegitimate male circumcision, and I question the interpretation and significance of the medical evidence cited by opponents.

But I disagree with Dr. Joel Rosenberg that there is a firm boundary between medical ethics and religion. In a theocracy, the issue is largely moot. But in a multicultural liberal democracy the two realms intersect often, with no clear boundary. The public, politicians and courts must adjudicate issues as they arise.

Second, Dr. Margaret Somerville is very sensitive to the position of Jewish supporters of circumcision and to the importance of religious rights and freedoms.

Third, I would strongly oppose lodging any formal complaints against her at McGill. That would undermine freedom of speech and academic inquiry – hers, mine and everyone's.

Vatican statement was no apology

Your heading (CJN, Sept. 17, p. B36) says in large letters: "Church issues statement of repentance." This is followed by a small article telling us "The Roman Catholic Church apologizes..." for failure to help Jews during the Shoah.

No such thing! I have a copy of this document. It condemns, regrets, sympathizes, blames members of the church. But not a single word of apology.

On March 19, you had a front page story with the same theme. Bert Raphael's letter of April 2 corrected you as above. The Vatican's statement is important – but it is not an apology. Also, one wonders why it took 10 years to produce it.

Simon Dubnow: a great historian

By ABRAHAM ARNOLD

In his second decade, Simon Dubnow became a rebel against Jewish Orthodoxy. In his fifth decade, he was drawn into the Jewish revolutionary movement in Russia, though he never became a socialist or a Zionist. In his last decade, he became a victim of the Shoah. His major legacy is his work as a great Jewish historian.

Dubnow is regarded as one of the three giants of modern Jewish historiography, along with Heinrich Graetz, who came before him, and Salo Baron, who followed. Dubnow has also been described as one of three great Jewish scholar-activists of east European Jewish life who were leaders in the secularization of Russian Jewry in the 19th century. The others were Haim Zhitlowski and Achad Ha'Am.

Dubnow was part of a continuum which brought the writing of Jewish history to a new level as social science. He was often in contention with his fellow activists over the path of Jewish self-determination. However, he shared with Zhitlowski and Achad Ha'Am the view that Judaism is a system of culture not based on religion alone. These three personalities are recognized as "path-breakers" in the modern movement of secular humanistic Judaism.

Dubnow was born in 1860 in Mstislavl, White Russia, on the second day of Rosh Hashanah, to a family of rabbis who could trace their lineage back to the Maharal of Prague. He received a cheder education, but at an early age he moved beyond the Bible and the Talmud to read such works as Josippon, a medieval history of the Second Temple era, and Moses Mendelssohn's Biur, on the Pentateuch. This led him to the Haskalah.

At his bar mitzvah, Dubnow refused to speak on his assigned subject – how a left-handed person should wear his tfillin. He had already written a Hebrew essay critical of religious fanaticism and favoring enlightenment, and he became known as an apikoires, a Jewish heretic. Later he also criticized the traditional cheder.

At age 14, in the official government Jewish school, he discovered the literature and language of Russia and the West. History soon took the place of religion for him, and he considered himself a "free thinker," in the spirit of Elisha ben Abuyah, noted in the Talmud for his "heretical" views.

In 1884, Dubnow visited his home town on the High Holy Days. Everyone was confounded when the grandson of Rabbi Bentsion, spiritual leader of the community, failed to appear in the synagogue on Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur.

Although he turned against Orthodoxy, Dubnow maintained a deep attachment to Jewish learning and shared his grandfather's devotion to Torah lishmah – study for its own sake. He called his grandfather the "spiritual giant who bequeathed to me my attachment to... the Torah, even though it was another Torah, a broad and free one." For him and his grandfather, he said, "the meaning of life was intellectually different... But ethically it was the same."

He had once planned to attend the Jewish theological seminary at Breslau and become a religious reformer. But then he discovered liberal philosophers such as Auguste Comte and John Stuart Mill.

Dubnow also discovered deism and became an agnostic. Yet he wrote, in 1910: "God is so near to me... I have returned... without the ritual and the dogmas, to the source of the spirit from which we both drew" (a reference to the grandfather).

He tried to enrol in the Vilna Jewish Teachers Institute, but he was turned down because it was thought he could not complete the course before being called to the Russian army. Ironically, he was rejected for military service because of poor eyesight.

At the gymnasium in Dvinski (Latvia) he endured great hardship as he studied, often living on a diet of bread, herring and tea. In the end, Dubnow failed to get into university because he could not pass an examination in mathematics! And so he became an "auto-didact," a self-trained scholar.

Dubnow was influenced by Ludwig Borne, in whose work he encountered "the voice of protest against despotism... the magic of the revolutionary spirit... (and the) battle for freedom of thought."

Dubnow in his library

Although he was drawn into the revolutionary events in Russia, Dubnow himself was always a moderate humanitarian reformer. He sought to work within the bounds of Judaism and he fought for Jewish rights. But he was not drawn to Zionism. Instead he developed his own theory of Jewish "autonomism," or cultural autonomy.

From 1880 to 1884 Dubnow lived in St. Petersburg, where he began writing and publishing essays in several Russian Jewish publications, including the monthly Voskhod, to which he became a regular contributor. His first article on Sabbatai Zevi was followed for more than two decades by essays on Chassidism, on the world history of the Jews and on Judaism; many of these went into his later books.

In 1883, he married Ida Freidlin, whom he had met five years earlier at a literary circle in his home town. They had three children, two daughters and a son. The oldest, Sophie Dubnow-Erlich, (1885-1986) also had a literary career and later wrote her father's biography.

In 1891, Dubnow published a long essay in Voskhod on The Study of the History on the Russian Jews and the Establishment of a Russian Jewish Historical Society. He also called for the collection of source materials on Russian Jewish history. He now called himself "a missionary for history."

The historical society was not started until 1908, but source materials began to arrive at his door from all over the Russian empire and eastern Europe. He also began digging into archives to find old minute books and build a rich archival collection. His passion for this work was later taken over by the Yiddish Scientific Institute (YIVO), of which he was a strong supporter from the day it was established in Vilna in 1925.

In 1890, the Dubnow family had moved to Odessa, where, for the next 13 years, his career flourished and he became an illustrious scholar and public figure. He described these years as the happiest time in his life.

In Odessa, he met Mendele Mocher-Seforim and Achad Ha'Am, Shalom Aleichem and Chaim Nachman Bialik, among others. They formed a literary circle of about a dozen people who began to meet on Saturday afternoons, either at Dubnow's home or at Mendele's. This group formed a new body called the National Committee, whose aim was to combat assimilation among the Russian Jewish intelligentsia.

Dubnow strongly defended the Yiddish language and Jewish life in the Diaspora. But he also supported Hebrew and Russian as appropriate for Jewish cultural development, explaining that for the Jews one language was never sufficient.

Following the 1903 Kishinev pogrom, Dubnow joined with Bialik and Achad Ha-Am in advocating a campaign against anti-Semitism, including Jewish self-defence. That year he moved from Odessa to Vilna, where, after the failed 1905 revolution, he helped to organize the League for the Attainment of Jewish Rights in Russia, which accepted his program for Jewish autonomous rights. He then worked to establish the Folkspartei, with the goal of electing a solid Jewish bloc to the second Duma.

In 1906, Dubnow moved back to St. Petersburg, the Russian capital, where he often had trouble getting a permit to live. He was named to the chair for Jewish history in the new Free University of Professor Lesgot, but that university was soon closed by the police as part of the clampdown on revolutionary trends. However, Dubnow was able to remain in St. Petersburg until he left Russia in 1922 to get away from the Bolshevik revolution.

Simon and Ida Dubnow moved to Vilna, where he was offered a university post. But he soon decided in favor of overseeing the publication of his books in Germany, Palestine and the United States. For this purpose, they moved to Berlin, where his 70th birthday was celebrated and widely recognized in 1930.

When Hitler rose to power, Dubnow was urged to go to Palestine or to America. He chose instead to move to Riga and wrote: "My friends in Palestine are astonished by my lack of desire to settle there. They don't understand that to change climate, language, the whole structure of life at our age would sap the rest of our strength."

A victim of Nazism himself, Dubnow was shot to death by a drunken Latvian guard in Riga, Dec. 8, 1941. His last words were reputed to be: "Brothers, do not forget! Recount what you hear and see! Brothers make a record of it all."

Dubnow's example in building a Jewish archives inspired Zelig Kalmanovich in the Vilna ghetto and Emanuel Ringelblum in Warsaw to collect the records of the Shoah. (Erlier, Kalmanovich had started a Yiddish translation from the Russian of Dubnow's World Jewish History. This was later completed in America.)

Why did Dubnow not leave Europe when a U.S. visa awaited him? There are those who say the decision was a result of his views on Diaspora nationalism. He had once been skeptical about the Balfour Declaration but later changed his mind. He urged all those who saw Palestine as a centre where Jewish autonomy was possible to take part in building it along with card-carrying Zionists.

In his youth, Simon Dubnow attacked "rabbinism," but his grandson, Victor Erlich, says that in his later years, his grandfather was no longer a "militant challenger of the rabbinical establishment." Erlich adds that Dubnow, though not observant, also began to attend synagogue on the Holy Days. But he always retained his secular philosophy.

Dubnow believed that Judaism, is "not merely a religion, like Christianity or Islam ...[but] a body of culture."

"Unique historical conditions," he wrote, "brought... the Jews under the dominance of religion and converted Judaism into an all-embracing world view which encompasses religious, ethical, social, messianic, political and philosophical elements.

"Judaism is broad enough and variegated enough so that any Jew can draw from its source according to his spirit and outlook."

Dubnow was a prolific and prodigious writer on Jewish history and Judaism. He wrote and published in Russian, Hebrew and Yiddish, and his works have appeared in German and in English. Notable among his books in English are History of the Jews, five volumes (Yoselloff 1967-1973); History of the Jews in Russia and Poland, three volumes (Jewish Publication Society, 1916-1920, reprinted by KTAV, 1975); and Nationalism and History, Essays on Old and New Judaism (Jewish Publication Society, 1958). His daughter's biography, The Life and Work of S.M. Dubnov, is particularly recommended.

Reflections on the War of Atonement

The Yom Kippur War of 1973 has forever changed the observance of Yom Kippur in Israel. The day is no longer just an occasion for personal reflection and re-evaluation. It has also become an occasion of national reckoning – a day of taking stock. In many ways, the war was Israel's finest military hour.

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

The IDF turned the tables, against terrible odds, and proved that it was, indeed, the strongest army in the region. But in Israel's consciousness, the war is identified, not with the victory, but with the mechdal – the failure to foresee it – and with the national "blind spot" that misled the political and military leadership of the day.

The Yom Kippur War broke out in Israel's 25th year, and this year, in turn, marks the 25th anniversary of that fateful assault on Israeli forces as the country was immersed in fasting and prayer. Today, there is a generation of young Israelis for whom the 1973 war is distant history and for whom the tales of courage and suffering are part of the nation's mythology.

From the perspective of 2½ decades later, the far-reaching impact of that war on Israel's psyche, society and politics is evident. If the 1967 Six Day War created a myth of invincibility, and, some say, even hubris, the Yom Kippur war resulted in the sobering, painful realization of the limitations of power. In 1973, Israelis recognized, both consciously and subconsciously, that their leadership was not infallible.

The year 1973 marked the transfer of the mantle from the generation of the founders of the state to a younger generation of leaders who would always be challenged more actively than their predecessors. After Levi Eshkol's death, Golda Meir had been persuaded to accept the prime ministership by a faction in Mapai (the old Labor party) who wanted to block the younger "upstarts" like Moshe Dayan and Yigal Allon…In 1974, she resigned, forever wounded by the ultimate responsibility for a war that had claimed the lives of 2,600 Israeli soldiers. Ironically, 1973 was also the year in which the diminutive giant, David Ben-Gurion, died at the age of 87.

If new political and social fissures originated in the heady days following the Six Day war, they rose dramatically to the surface after 1973. The raw trauma of the Yom Kippur War seemed to unleash a wave of grassroots activists who questioned the old political ways and fought for a clearer ideological articulation of their political vision. The settler movement, Gush Emunim, burst upon the Israeli scene in 1974, while the Peace Now movement, led by reserve soldiers, amplified earlier expressions of ambivalence by soldiers in 1967.

The demise of Labor as Israel's natural governing party only found expression in 1977, but the seeds were sown in 1973. The disaffection with the old elite deepened once the results of the Agranat Commission of Inquiry into the war were made public. Subsequent ethical scandals in the first Yitzhak Rabin government, and Rabin's own inexperience, resulted in the anti-Labor vote that catapulted Menachem Begin's Herut to power, following an unbroken 44 years in Opposition in the Yishuv and then the state of Israel.

Begin's rise to power was accompanied by another, significant trend. He was elected to office by a generation of Israelis whose immigrant parents had arrived from Arab countries in the 1950s. These Mizrachim had come of age by 1977, and in voting against Labor, they settled their account with the establishment that, in their view, had kept them out of the elite core of Israeli politics and society. The "ethnicization" of Israeli politics continued into the 1980s, climaxing in the sweep of Shas (an ultra-Orthodox, ethnic party that first ran in 1984) in the 1990s, and Benjamin Netanyahu's "coalition of outsiders."

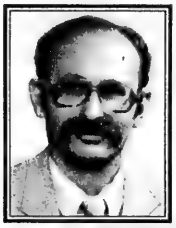
Ironically, it was the Yom Kippur War that first planted the seeds of a negotiated arrangement between Israel and its Arab neighbors. Israel's victory in 1967 was greeted with the resounding three "no's" of the Khartoum Summit. Egyptian President Anwar al-Sadat would probably not have come to Jerusalem if not for the initial victory of Egyptian honor in 1973, and the concomitant recognition that Israel could not, in fact, be defeated militarily.

And the 1974 disengagement talks between Israel, the Egyptians and the Syrians were the first direct talks they had held since the armistice talks of 1949. Those negotiations, which were brokered through U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger's shuttle diplomacy, paved the way for later talks with Egypt. In the case of Syria, the disengagement agreement has been scrupulously adhered to by the Syrians, and it remains the governing framework for the Israeli-Syrian relationship on the Golan Heights.

In 1973, the nation mourned its dead and wounded. One generation later, in 1998, it rationally assesses the impact of that milestone, but the pain is no less acute.

Monica Lewinsky, the president and liberal Jews

Some weeks ago Senator Joseph Lieberman rose in the U.S. Senate and delivered a stinging moral rebuke to President Bill Clinton about his behavior in the Lewinsky affair. Lieberman's decision could not have been easy, as he is a Democrat and longtime supporter of the Clinton agenda. He did not mince words.



By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

The commentators of the day spoke of the senator as a moral conscience of the Senate. Moreover, they made extensive reference to his being an Orthodox Jew, a man of deep religious conviction and faith.

The senator's position stands in marked contrast to the mainstream, liberal Jewish response. The response here has been a mixture of celebration of the president's publicized atonement flavored by a plethora of references to Yom Kippur; argument that his actions, while deplorable, were essentially private; recognition that he was a good president for Jews and Jewish (liberal) causes, including supporting the peace process; and attacks on Ken Starr and the Republican right.

The Forward featured one story about meetings held by Clinton officials with organized Jewish communal leaders, most of whom were associated with liberal causes. A participant in one meeting kvelled about how Ann Lewis, the president's representative and herself a Jew, used the term tikkun olam to describe the president's position.

A later story in The Forward contrasted traditional and liberal Jewish responses. One representative of the group, Toward Tradition, criticized the president and claimed that it was "concern for abuse of power by an executive that led the Bible in Deuteronomy to instruct every Jewish king to always carry a scroll containing the Bible." This contrasts with supporter Steven Grossman, chair of the Democratic National Committee, who is quoted as saying, "Mr. President, the Jewish community will go to shul on Yom Kippur and look to Isaiah…and pray for you." A recent widely circulated e-mail message by a prominent feminist Jewish scholar contained a strident attack on the anti-Clinton efforts.

Perhaps most telling was a story in the New York Times describing Clinton's continued support, moral and financial, among "Hollywood Democrats." They allegedly raised $1.5 million (US) for the party at a fundraising dinner at the home of Israeli-born businessman Haim Saban. The article did not mention it, but almost all of the players were Jews.

Why the support for the president? "Hollywood has seen worse," commented one producer and Democrat. Barbra Streisand complained that "the press no longer respected the boundaries between public and private behavior."

Was the president's conduct really private? If Monica Lewinsky were a waitress two blocks from the White House and the president sneaked out to have late night encounters with her, I would agree. There would be no public interest in the matter – though there are always national security risks in such activities.

But it is a matter of public interest. Lewinsky was an intern at the White House, then an employee, and the encounters were held there, in the workplace, often during the work day. Clinton's relationship with Lewinsky falls within the evolving conventions of sexual harassment and/or professional misconduct. It does not matter if she came on to him first. By having an affair with her, he – among many other things – created an unequal or hostile work environment for other interns.

It also may have impacted on the conduct of his office. One of the encounters with Lewinsky took place simultaneously with the president's phone conversation with a member of Congress about American policy toward Bosnia. The fate of thousands of refugees may well have been on the table; we don't know the details of the call. But the grotesque juxtaposition of these two activities – was he concentrating, and on what? – offends any Jew with a sense of history.

I do not support the excesses of Ken Starr, or the hypocritical zeal of the Republican right. Nor do I think the president's actions rise to the level of "high crimes and misdemeanors." But I am also somewhat uneasy about his strong public support from the liberal American Jewish community, with whom I generally identify. It smacks of an amoral quid pro quo or a misplaced loyalty and partisanship.

Stories from the BAR

The BAR referred to in the headline is the magazine, Biblical Archaeology Review. Published six times a year under editor Hershel Shanks, BAR presents a variety of material. It deals with digging up ancient artifacts and construing images of ancient life, and ranges across the entire spectrum of history.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Thus, I looked twice at one headline that read: "Sex scandal rocks government," with a sub-heading: "How do you spell Monica in cuneiform?"

Readers will be puzzled, and understandably so. They are likely to know the meaning of Monica, but may have forgotten that cuneiform was one of the earliest forms of writing, originating in the Mesopotamian valley thousands of years ago.

Of course, the sex scandal alluded to by BAR, has nothing to do with the president of the United States, but rather with an event that happened around the year 1400 BCE.

There too, a young lady was involved with a public official. Her name was Humerelli and the official, who bore the cognomen Kushshiharbe, was at the time mayor of Nuzi, an important city in the kingdom of Mittani. Nuzi gained worldwide attention in the 1920s when archeologists found thousands of tablets that told us much about life in those days. Quite expectedly, there were telling parallels to our time.

Here is what BAR has to tell us about the young women and the mayor: The latter had allegedly been guilty of immoral behavior with Humerelli, not only once but twice. He had used government agents to bring him to the trysting place, and one of the agents testified to this.

Incidentally, the mayor was accused of other misdeeds as well, including misappropriation of crown property, diverting tax collection for his own use, and accepting bribes.

Now of course you want to know how it all came out. Unfortunately, no tablets containing the verdict were found in the treasure trove of Nuzi. We do not know whether the mayor denied everything or apologized and asked for forgiveness, whether he was judged innocent or was convicted.

You may wonder in what language the Nuzi tablets were written. The answer is Akkadian, which at the time was the language of the cultured elite who could read and write. But most of the people of Mesopotamia did not speak Akkadian; they spoke Sumerian. Thus a contemporary of the mayor and his lady friend would likely converse in Sumerian, but write in Akkadian when recording the facts.

Such a dichotomy has occurred frequently in history. Thus, in the talmudic age, the learned wrote in Hebrew, while the popular language of Jews at the time was Aramaic. (That is the reason why the Talmud is, to a significant degree, written in Aramaic.)

All of this illustrates one potent point: Archeology – while dealing with the past – not only unearths old civilizations, but illuminates our own as well. For human nature has not changed very greatly since the bygone days; a fact reflected in the famous biblical saying, "There is nothing new under the sun."

Zvi (Henry) Weinberg's astonishing transformation

By Sheldon Kirshner

Zvi (Henry) Weinberg's transformation is nothing short of astonishing. Not so long ago, he labored in the groves of academia.

Today, he sits in the Knesset as the only non-Russian representative of Natan Sharansky's immigrant party, Yisrael b'Aliyah.

And, as he acknowledged in an interview while passing through Toronto recently, it isn't easy being a politician. "It's a life of hard work and stress."

A professor of French at the University of Toronto until he made aliyah in 1992, Weinberg said that his regimen has changed dramatically since 1996.

In May of that year, Yisrael b'Aliyah won seven Knesset seats, and proceeded to join Benjamin Netanyahu's right-wing coalition government. Since then, Weinberg, who describes himself as left of centre with respect to Israeli political issues, has immersed himself from head to toe in party and state affairs.

Weinberg is a member of several parliamentary committees, including the law and justice committee which oversees 60 percent of all legislation passed by the Knesset, and he travels widely on behalf of the government. Of late, he has visited Russia, Poland and equatorial Africa.

His schedule is so crowded that he has had to make painful sacrifices. "I haven't read a book since the election," complained Weinberg, a divorced father of four who resides in Jerusalem's Ramot district.

For all his dedication to the Knesset, he is not exactly enamored of the rough and tumble of Israeli politics.

Not one to mince his words, he declared, "There is a total lack of courtesy and manners in the Knesset. It is a tough neighborhood. I don't always admire professional politicians."

All too often, he observed, they lack integrity, preen for the camera, engage in uncivil behavior and truly believe that they have a monopoly on the truth.

"That cuts across all parties, except our own," he claimed without sounding sanctimonious. "We don't shout, scream and interject. But I have no illusion that our example will be imitated." He added, "I try, basically, to preserve my principles and remain true to my ideals and conscience."

A Soviet Jewry activist from the 1960s onward, Weinberg joined Yisrael b'Aliyah at its moment of inception in 1995. But politics was always in his blood. He worked for Robert Kennedy during the 1968 California primary and knocked on doors for Canadian MPs.

Impressed by Weinberg's credentials and his sense of purpose, Sharansky and his second-in-command, Yuli Edelstein, asked Weinberg to join the fledgling party's steering committee.

Weinberg, who speaks Russian and six other languages, knew both men. He met Sharansky in 1994 and formed a support group for Edelstein before his departure from the Soviet Union in 1989. (The pair both hold cabinet portfolios, Sharansky being minister of trade and industry and Edelstein being minister of immigrant absorption.)

During the Israeli election, Weinberg barnstormed for Yisrael b'Aliyah and travelled around the country with Sharansky, whom he describes as highly intelligent and dynamic. "He has learned the art of survival, and it helps him now," he said of Sharansky, a former dissident who languished in a gulag for years. "In politics, only the toughest, quickest and brightest can succeed."

Henry Weinberg

In Weinberg's view, there was a genuine need for an ethnic-based party like Yisrael b'Aliyah. "The government didn't quite understand all the complexities of Russian immigration and absorption. There had to be a Russian party to find housing and jobs for new olim."

On the day he took his seat in the Knesset, Weinberg gave up his Canadian and American citizenships, an act, he boasted, which catapulted him into the Guinness Book of Records. Appparently, he is the first person to give up both Canadian and American citizenship at the same time.

Weinberg, the second Canadian after the late Dov Joseph to become an Israeli parliamentarian, was born in Cracow in 1935, one of four children of Rachel and Moshe David, a businessman and Jewish community leader.

The Weinbergs left Poland shortly after the outbreak of World War II and managed to elude the Nazis. Weinberg does not like to discuss his family's ordeal, but he disclosed that his father died of typhus while on the run from the Germans and that 22 of his cousins perished during the Holocaust.

In the aftermath of the war, he found himself in France, then spent a year on an Israeli kibbutz, Ein Tzurim. After Israel, he lived in Chicago, taking his BA and MA degrees in French literature at Northwestern University. He received his PhD from the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor, and from 1965 to 1970, he taught at the University of California at Irvine.

A specialist in the 19th century French novel and in literary criticism, Weinberg accepted a position at the University of Toronto in 1970. As a scholar, he has written four books on topics running the gamut from French Jews and Emile Zola to Russian Jewry.

Always a Zionist, Weinberg, a former deputy chair of Canadian Professors for Peace in the Middle East, spent three sabbaticals in Israel while still an academic. "I thought I knew the country, but after moving to Israel I realized this wasn't true."

Israel, he marvelled, is a society which thrives on miracles. "The problems we have to solve in the next few years countries like Canada solved years ago," said Weinberg, an observant Jew who wears a yarmulke indoors and a soft cap outdoors. "We live in a daily state of crisis. Israel's social, economic and ethnic fabric remains very tenuous. Israel is an extremely fragile society."

Weinberg supports the Oslo peace process, though he believes that the Palestinians must exert greater efforts to combat terrorism. He has urged Netanyahu to carry out the American plan for a further 13 percent withdrawal from the West Bank as soon as possible.

The Palestinians, he said, are entitled to statehood, provided they fulfil all the clauses of the Oslo agreements.

As for Lebanon, he believes that Israel should withdraw from the quagmire of its self-declared security zone in the southern part of that country. Weinberg belongs to Yossi Beilin's advocacy group, whose stated goal is a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon.

Not surprisingly, Weinberg is a strong exponent of aliyah. "Without aliyah, Israel can't survive. But Israel must not stimulate aliyah from Russia. This could cause problems for Jews. We should not stampede them into a panic."

Weinberg noted that the economic situation in Russia is desperate and that anti-Semitism is widespread. "But I'm not sure many Jews will immigrate to Israel unless there is a total economic collapse. The Jews left in Russia are relatively well off and assimilated. I don't expect mass immigration of the kind of the early 1990s."

Weinberg, who claims he organized the first Russian seder in Toronto more than 30 years ago, concedes that Yisrael b'Aliyah hasn't been able to keep all its promises to its Russian constituents. There is still a shortage of rental apartments and not enough retraining programs. "But we've made the Russian community respectable in the eyes of Israelis. Israeli society is afraid of the Russians."

Weinberg does not plan to run in the next election. "I want time to read and write and to enjoy my grandchildren. I've made my contribution."

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI RONNIE CAHANA

Building a home

There is a chassidic story about a lost and broken man sifting through the rubble of his home after yet another pogrom. All day the Chassid stood there fingering every scrap of what once was. "What are you doing with these shards of rubble?" the rebbe asked him. "I'm rebuilding my home," came the reply. "Why here?" asked the rebbe. "Because here in my memories is where I want God to find me."

Everybody needs a home, seeks it and builds it. And the religious insist desperately that God be a part of that home.

I was born into a small Jewish community in Sweden consisting only of survivors from the Shoah. This may be the only continuing kehila still existing that was settled by refugees from Auschwitz. They were there, I was told, because, while the Swedish government granted asylum to some survivors, the Swedish Jewish lay and religious leaders refused them entry into their cities. So victims from the Shoah were homeless and rejected, even among our own in the communities that were spared destruction.

In 1949, my Israeli father was sent to Sweden by the Sochnut, the Jewish Agency, to be the rabbi for these beleaguered and silenced Jews who were haunted by the horrors they had known but driven by an unheard voice to rebuild the sweet memories of their home. They were in a world that wanted nothing of their memories, and yet unstoppably, they were creators of a new home in a transplanted world.

I believe that I am now the rabbi of a synagogue – the Lodzer Holocaust Centre Congregation – whose members care about being a true religious community. They, who have lived the tragedies of Jewish history, who now live on this side, treasure true freedom and honor human dignity. Like my little community in Sweden, these survivors from Lodz, Poland are here to recreate their home.

In survivor congregations, I don't hear "We are cultural Jews" or "A shul is a business." A shul is not a business. The world doesn't need more businesses or feel-good cultures under the guise of a religious institution; but the world does need more sensitive harbors where friends can express their lost world of spirit and the dreams of the ages in a caring, warm and dignified setting. A synagogue is not judged by how observant the congregants and leaders are. The real issue is not what kind of Jew, but how kind the Jew.

The message of this synagogue's founders, and for that matter, all survivors is this: One is forbidden to hurt or humiliate another in God's world again. Uplift and never tear down! All must rebuild in God's world.

We are too precious for a petty life or a petty politic. A shul or home in search of a Godly Presence is really more like a sukkah – a flimsy structure that is vulnerable to the elements, yet needs pieced together walls for support. Every little steadying is appreciated.

What's important is not its fineness. What's important is that the stars can be seen through the roof, that everyone in a sukkah can look up to heaven together. At Sukkot, Jews rebuild and God remembers.

Directly after the soul-wrenching inner cleansing of our frailest selves, where we still hold on to the judgments of Yom Kippur, we build the sukkah, exposed, but centring ourselves again in the world. Who is not frail now? Who is not in need? But we build and we invite and we remember that we must change the world into a caring one, to bring the Mashiach speedily forth in our day. Amen.

The Jewish Highway

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

A cholent of Web sites

While surfing the Jewish Highway, you come across some original sites that don't fall into neat categories but do deserve attention. Some of them have a wide appeal; others merit mention because of the care and dedication of their creators. Today, I present a potpourri (or should I say a cholent) of those sites.

When Nachum Shifren talks about "surfing," he uses that term literally. Rabbi Shifren is the creator of Surf & Soul: Jewish Surfers International [http://www.surfsoul.co.il]. Like all true surfers, the "surfing rabbi" is a native of Southern California where he rode the waves in Malibu and was a lifeguard for 10 years. After moving to Israel in the '70s, he received his rabbinical ordination. He has now created a Web site that combines his two passions – Jewish outreach and surfing. As the rabbi quotes, "Those who go down to the sea... in mighty waters, they saw the works of God and His wonders in the deep." (Psalms 107:23) [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/trace/mthil107.html#23].

Polly and Esther Fleagleman are two lively gals just looking for some fun. Don't take my word for it – that's how they describe themselves at their Life in the Fast Lane Web site [http://members.rotfl.com/cookie4/].

The sisters have created a humorous, award-winning site that reflects what seem to be two delightful lives. You'll find everything from recipes (Why say it with flowers when you can say it with brisket?) to Tales of the Evil Eye (One should not believe in superstitions but it is best to be heedful of them) to The Art of Collecting Sweet'n'Low (Collecting is not stealing! If there is more than they need, you are just doing a mitzvah so they shouldn't waste it).

When I first came across the next site, I didn't know what to think. But after taking a further look, I marvel at the site's depth and the dedication of its author. Jews in the Civil War is a real eye-opener [http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Forum/1867/jewish.htm]. Leah M. Berkowitz's large site is divided into two parallel columns exploring the Jewish experience for the Union and Confederate armies.

Included on the Union side is an examination of whether Ulysses Grant really was an anti-Semite and a letter to Abraham Lincoln from the father of a shomer Shabbat soldier. On the Confederate side, you can read from the diary of Eleanor Cohen Seixas, Southern Patriot, and glance at photos from the Hebrew Confederate cemetery in Richmond, Va., the only Jewish military cemetery in the world outside the state of Israel. There are fascinating excerpts from both Union and Confederate Passover seders.

A few weeks ago, after doing a series of columns on Sephardi music, I received an e-mail from Dr. Judith Cohen of Toronto. "I'm a longtime specialist in Sephardi music, especially Judeo Spanish, with a Web page [http://www.fusionmill.inter.net/core/judith_cohen/] and several recordings. I work both as an academic researcher and as a performer, together with my daughter, Tamar Ilana." Some of her research: Judeo-Spanish songs and traditions; ethno-musicological research with Portuguese Crypto-Jews in Belmonte; and a discography of Judeo-Spanish song!

Have you created a Web page that you are proud of? Or is there a Jewish page you find yourself constantly revisiting that you feel everyone should know about? Please e-mail me about them at address below.

Jewish Life

Jewish business ethics

Books

By Bernard Baskin

Business Ethics: A Jewish Perspective*, by Moses L. Pava (KTAV, $25).

In recent years a wave of financial scandals has shaken the Jewish community. How to conduct one's business ethically is emerging as a central concern among rabbis and responsible community leaders.

It is shocking that even some pious Jews, punctilious about ritual laws and observances, tend to overlook some of Judaism's ethical commandments.

We are commanded in the Torah, "You must not steal, you must not act deceitfully, you must not lie to one another." Theft, fraud, payoffs, bribes, "insider trading" violate what is basic in Judaism.

The talmudic literature is full of laws governing commercial life: how an employer is to behave toward his employees and the duties of employees to their employer; which prices are legitimate and which constitute overcharging; how false weights and measures are to be avoided; how business contracts are to be drawn up; how conditions of sale are to be made binding; what is fair and what unfair competition.

A fourth-century Babylonian teacher, Rava, said that on Judgment Day the first question God asks a man is: "Were you reliable in your business dealings?" The talmudic sages based their approach to ethics on the biblical verse, "And you shall do what is right and good in the sight of the Lord." Before contemplating any business deal a person should not only consider whether it will be to his advantage or whether it is legal or illegal, but whether it is good and right in God's eyes.

Moses L. Pava is a professor at Yeshiva University's School of Business. His book looks at both the substance and methods of Jewish business ethics. His emphasis is on introducing and interpreting classical Jewish texts in the light of the contemporary situation in the marketplace.

He makes clear, drawing on the insights of Jewish scholars old and new, that economic activities are never to be viewed as ends in themselves. Rather, at the individual and national levels, they must be regarded as a means toward building a just and caring society in which the best of human and spiritual values may flourish.

He quotes a student who wrote, "There is a real business world out there and people have to out-manoeuvre each other. If one is more successful than the other, it does not mean that the person was being unethical. It just implies that the person was more witty than his competitors."

Whatever the merits of this view might be as a description of the way we actually live, the author emphasizes that it falls well short of Jewish ideals.

Pava discusses such matters as the substance of Jewish business ethics and the need of going "beyond the letter of the law." The book, however, tends to be abstract and theoretical, rather than down to earth and pragmatic. But this is a necessary study on an increasingly complex and vital subject: how to achieve a realistic and meaningful ethic that flows from the conjunction of the "ideal and the real, the heavenly and the earthy, the theoretical and the practical."

'I felt adrift'

By SUSAN BERRIN

Guest Voices

The day we left Victoria I felt my life was full of chaos and question, and I was struck by how "normal" life appeared as we drove to the airport.

Each of us, feeling some relief that the packing was complete, wondered about the next weeks of transition and change.

Having lived for 16 years as the rabbinical family in Victoria, we had nurtured deep roots and created strong bonds. But after a year's sabbatical in Boston (Newton, to be exact), we returned to Victoria feeling less secure about our future. We realized that, as a family, we needed a larger Jewish community, a deeper pool of resources for our growing children.

Our decision to leave Victoria rested on the sadness of leaving dear friends and a supportive community. But our commitment to our children continued to propel us back to Boston. We had all made good connections during our sabbatical: The children had attended wonderful Jewish day schools; we had joined two vibrant synagogues; and we had begun to meet people, with the promise of meaningful and profound friendship.

Our arrival in Boston in late July felt surreal. After all our planning and organizing, our tearful goodbyes, had we really arrived to begin what we hoped would be the fulfilment of our new dreams?

After a brief stay with family, we moved our few portable belongings to our first house-sitting assignment. Because we had not yet found a house to buy or rent, we had left most of our belongings in Victoria, packed and ready for the moving van to be summoned in a few weeks.

Our first task, after settling our son Yossi at Camp Yavneh in New Hampshire (our daughter Noa had been there since the beginning of July as a counsellor in training), and arranging for our 7-year-old Tzvia to attend a local Jewish day camp, was to find a house.

We began looking in earnest a day or two after our arrival in Newton. We had several requirements: The house had to be within walking distance of the two shuls we attended and the community we were beginning to call our chevra. The children needed to be able to walk on Shabbat with the groups of friends who made Shabbat such a rich experience. The house needed to have four bedrooms so that the children could each have some of their own space. The house had to be available immediately – we were desperate to be settled before the children began school in September, and the price had to be within our budget.

We finally decided on the "right" house. Our offer, then counter offer, were accepted just before Shabbat. It was with some relief, some joy and some resignation that we entered Shabbat – our task complete, but knowing that the house, while it met all our requirements, was far from the gracious home we had left in Victoria. We were practising the art of compromise.

For our first Shabbat, we attended services at the Newton Centre Minyan, a well-organized chavurah-style group of 150 families. Without a building of its own, the group meets in a church social hall. When we were here for sabbatical, we alternated between this shul and one that is liberal orthodox. After a couple weeks of alternating, our then 5-year-old daughter Tzvia asked, "This Shabbes are we going to shul or church?" A careful explanation that the service was only held at a church, set her straight.

We were welcomed warmly, and invitations for Shabbat dinner and lunch were profuse.

Only during the returning of the Torah, singing Eitz Chayim Hi, a passage that became especially meaningful to me when we inscribed it on the gravestone of my Aunt Belle, did the tears start to roll down my cheeks. I think, in part, it was the relief that we had actually made it. Although we still have so much to settle, and we know the transition is just beginning, we had accomplished so much in the last several weeks.

But I think the tears were also for my community in Victoria. I stood on my own. Around me were friends who had encouraged our move and helped us in innumerable ways to make possible what we have referred to as "aliyah to Newton." I trust these friendships will grow deep and solid, but at that moment I felt unmoored, adrift in these new waters.

Susan Berrin will be a Guest Voice from time to time, chronicling her family's move from Victoria, B.C., to Boston.

Author chronicles life in Nazi-occupied Hungary

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Not many people live a life so exciting that it can make a good book.

But that is what North Yorker Emery Rodan has achieved with the publication of his book, 111 Main Street, about his hairbreadth escapes from the Nazis in Hungary. He is currently writing a screenplay describing his experiences.

The Rodan odyssey includes back-breaking work in a labor camp near the town of Koeszeg in Hungary; hiding in two bunkers in Kosice, one below the dome of a synagogue; witnessing the shooting of Jews on the banks of the Danube by the Arrow Cross, the pro-Nazi Hungarian militia; and a sojourn in Venezuela before coming to Canada.

In the Koeszeg labor camp, Rodan was in a unit that blasted rock from the mountain to be used in a road. Part of the process required him to hold a steel bit while two other men hammered it into the rock with a sledgehammer. One day, a spark flew into his eye, resulting in his hospitalization, and saving him from deportation, along with the other Jews, to a concentration camp.

His tale is a recital of what happened to all the members of his large mishpachah, and though told in a chatty, day-to-day style, it vibrates with the excitement of momentous events.

His saddest memory, he writes, is of visiting his uncle, Moritz, in Israel, who was then almost blind and penniless, but was once one of the wealthiest men in the former Czechoslovakia.

One of his closest calls came when he and his brother Leslie were arrested in Budapest by the Arrow Cross, but released at the urging of the crowd.

Rodan's father died when he was only 15 years old and Emery had to enter the family's textile business at 111 Main Street – the title of his book. It was behind a facade at this location that the Rodan family hid in a bunker.

The 76-year-old Rodan can look back on a life of ups and downs anchored by his romance and eventual marriage to Rosalie, another survivor. The Rodans have two children, Robert in Toronto and Marilyn in New York.

Russian Middle Class Looks to Israel

By Adi Neuberger

There's a new Jewish face to the financial crisis in the former Soviet Union, with Jewish Agency officials warning that economic and political erosion are giving rise to a different category of Olim.

While Jewish Agency emissaries maintain the prevailing sentiments among Russia's Jews are uncertainty and concern, not panic, and fear, middle class Jews are being particularly hard hit by the recent economic downturn. The middle class is now contemplating aliyah to escape the aftermath which some predict could include renewed anti-semitism.

"Many young Jewish professionals have lost a lot of money and political influence literally overnight," reports Baruch Gur, Director General of Keren Hayesod, which is supported by the world-wide UJA Federation system.

Never before, according to Gur, have the prospects of moving to Israel been so appealing to an increasing number of Jews who prospered after Communism and never thought they would face financial danger.

"These potential new olim are mostly young to middle aged professionals who hold little hope of recovering from their losses," says Gur. "It's not a situation where they are fighting for their life - just their livelihood."

While Gur cautions that significant middle class emigration will not begin for several months, he notes an increase in the number of 20-45-year-old professionals signing up for Hebrew language ulpan classes in major cities.

"World Jewry must be able to respond with immediacy to help Russian Jews who want to make aliya during the next few months and years," stresses Joseph Steiner, president of UJA Federation. "This situation and the potential for a new phase of aliyah adds a sense of urgency to the campaign which is underway to raise funds for Jewish rescue."

The current community Campaign for Fifty, to raise $50 million annually by 2001, will allocate $13.5 million to programs strengthening Jewish identity, assisting the vulnerable and rescuing Jews from insecure regions, such as the FSU. Since 1989, the Jewish Agency, with UJA Federation funding, has brought nearly 800,000 from the FSU to Israel. The current rate of emigration is 4,000 a month.

Getting Ready to Phone for Fifty

UJA Federation's upcoming Phoning for Fifty telethons, October 18 - 22 and November 15 - 19, signal the second critical phase of its most ambitious community campaign ever, to raise $50 million annually by the year 2001. Hundreds of campaigners have raised nearly $23 million so far, which includes over $4 million in increased gifts.

Phoning for Fifty telethon co-chairs Marlene Axmith, Cheryl Jackson and Richard Sadowski are determined to keep up the strong momentum which has already propelled the campaign to historic heights, but they caution that maintaining momentum is a lot more difficult than creating it. They also emphasize the personal rewards of performing charity and helping Jews in need.

"By just taking a few hours to make some phone calls, one person can help raise thousands of dollars," explains Jackson, who brought her two daughters Sari and Devra to make calls during the September telethons. "It's simple," adds Jackson. "If we don't make the calls we don't raise the money and thousands don't receive much needed help."

"These telethons give everyone the chance to perform a mitzva," says Sadowski, who hopes to be joined by his 98-year-old grandmother. "Bringing family members along helps reinforce the Jewish value of tzedakah for generations to come," he adds.

The Campaign for Fifty will be allocating $13.5 million in new funds to strengthen Jewish identity, assist the vulnerable and rescue Jews from danger.

To register for a telethon shift, days or evenings, please call (416) 635-2883 ext. 115.

Campaign for Fifty telethons are drawing large numbers of families like (l-r) David, Tina and Judy Engel to make calls on behalf of Jews in need.

Ethiopian Jew studies for Conservative rabbinate

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yafete Alemu braved wild animals in the desert when he fled Ethiopia in 1982, but what frightens him today are divisions in Israeli society.

A longtime community activist who co-founded South Wing to Zion (a breakaway group from Israel's Ethiopian umbrella organization), he has been involved in bringing 14,000 Ethiopian Jews to Israel. Over 70,000 Ethiopians, half of whom are under age 18, live in Israel today.

Alemu, who lives in Jerusalem, is the first Ethiopian oleh to study for the Conservative rabbinate. He hopes to repair some of those societal divisions – particularly for Ethiopian youth – by establishing an educational institute to be called Midreshet L'Yahadut Ethiopia (The Institute for Ethiopian Jewry), following his ordination next year.

Alemu, a compact, affable man in his late thirties, was brought to Toronto recently by UJA Federation to speak to community groups and at Jewish schools and synagogues. In a 90-minute interview, he discussed some of the issues facing Ethiopian olim and told of his escape from Ethiopia, a story filled with drama and poignancy.

As a young teenager, Alemu studied Bible and prayer with a kes (an Ethiopian Jewish spiritual leader) and planned to become a kes himself. Living in a Jewish village in Gondar, about 1,000 km from Addis Ababa, Alemu and his family practised an observant biblical lifestyle.

Among Jewish practices he recalls, menstruating women would sit in a "special hut" for seven days. People who had touched a dead body would also "sit out of the house" for seven days, following which they would immerse themselves in the river for purification.

Because the community had been isolated from other Jews since before the time of the Second Temple, they knew nothing of the Talmud or midrash. Alemu is grateful to have the opportunity to learn about them now, he said.

The crocheted kippah on his head is the most obvious sign of his religious evolution. "We came [to Israel] to continue to be Jewish," he said. "Can we continue as we were in Ethiopia? No. We have to continue our Jewishness in a modern way."

At the same time, he is deeply concerned about Ethiopian youth who are "like a plant without roots." Many have abandoned their Judaism, he said, and some identify more with black American culture than with religious or secular Israeli culture.

Many of the newcomers are studying in youth villages, separated from their families and becoming more "Israeli," while the older generation (over age 40) is having difficulty adapting.

After 15 years in Israel and having served in the IDF, Alemu considers himself "like any Israeli."

Raised in an openly observant family, Alemu didn't hide his Jewish background like some of the Ethiopian city dwellers did.

That changed in 1982. With an ORT scholarship to study computer science at Brooklyn College in New York, Alemu had just boarded the airplane in Addis Ababa that was to take him out of the country. He was ordered off, with his hands up, and interrogated for four consecutive days at a government security office.

"Why are Jewish people running [from Ethiopia]?" he was asked. "Why do you want to go through Israel to America? What do Jewish people look like? What do they eat?"

"They are farmers," Alemu answered. "They eat food. They look like me and like any other Ethiopians."

He was warned he would be in trouble if he tried to leave Addis Ababa. "We know you are Jewish," he was told.

Fearing imprisonment, he fled the capital city, even though his identity card and passport – without which it was forbidden to travel – had been confiscated.

Prayer helped dissipate his fear. He boarded a bus heading toward his village, to tell his wife, Adna – whom he'd married at 17 – of his plans to leave the country on foot. At least three times on his way home, he narrowly escaped detection.

Once, an angry, armed soldier entered the bus, demanding identity papers from all the passengers. "I knew if he caught me, he would kill me."

Suddenly inspired, Alemu rose from his seat and began to collect the requested items from his fellow passengers. The soldier accepted the batch of papers, returned them to Alemu and wished him a peaceful journey.

Alemu still asks himself why nobody challenged him and what caused the change in the soldier's attitude. "For me there's one answer. God came and helped me."

Adna, who was two months' pregnant with their third child, wanted to leave Ethiopia with him, but he felt the journey would be too perilous. "She cried, and I cried," he recalls.

"At least I have children," he told her. "Help them to grow up."

For 28 days Alemu walked through the desert to Sudan, rationing his food and water. He travelled at night, deeming wild animals less of a risk than daytime fighting between soldiers and anti-government forces.

At the Sudanese border, he requested political asylum, still not admitting his religious affiliation. With the help of a Jewish Red Cross official posted in Sudan, he arrived in Israel three months later.

Shortly afterward, he began to study nursing and now works part-time as a registered nurse at Hadassah Hospital. Adna and their children arrived in 1986 on Operation Moses. She also trained as a nurse and works at Shaare Zedek Medical Center. They had a fourth child eight years ago.

A sense of urgency about the Jewish future of Ethiopian youth was an important factor in Alemu's decision to pursue rabbinic studies. He is also working on a master's degree in Jewish history, specializing in community education.

"The [Ethiopian] child doesn't understand the father and the father doesn't understand his child," Alemu said. "I can't imagine what will happen if we don't do something today in the field of education. I think it will be very bad."

His proposed institute, which is still short of funding, is to include five staff kessim to teach Ethiopian tradition. Alemu will provide the link between Ethiopian tradition and rabbinic tradition. Eight students are involved in the project, and will teach parents and children together.

Alemu chose to study at the (Conservative) Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies after a representative of an Orthodox yeshiva told him the Orthodox institution would teach him "the right way." At the Conservative institute, by contrast, he felt he was respected as an equal. There are a handful of Ethiopians who have become Orthodox rabbis, he noted.

The Masorti (Conservative) movement has much to offer not only Ethiopian Jews, but the entire Jewish community, Alemu said.

Proposed institute short of funding

"They are not left. They are not right. They are a middle. It doesn't matter whether in Israel or abroad, we need a middle ground that [helps] us understand each other."

Although Alemu is comfortable with the Conservative movement, he is uncomfortable with divisions in Judaism. "For me, Conservative...is just a name. The important thing is what we can do on behalf of the Jewish people to continue Jewish tradition."

He fears the implications of "misunderstandings" within Israeli society. "Religious people don't want to sit with non-religious, and sometimes there is hatred, which [is increasing]. That is dangerous."

As a black Israeli, he admits to having been "stereotyped," but won't go so far as to use the word racism. It's common for Israelis to think Ethiopians can't get things done, he explained.

He hasn't let that deter him.

"I want to give [Ethiopian young people] roots, so they know their tradition and respect their tradition. And let them understand that the basis is the same. We're all Jews. We have the same basis – the Torah."

Morris heads to Jerusalem

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —As a 20-year-old student at Hebrew University, Nomi Morris of Toronto dreamed that one day she would be a foreign correspondent covering Jerusalem and the world around it.

Today that dream has come true, as Morris, now 36, has been appointed Middle East bureau chief for Knight Ridder Newspapers. Her posting, based in Jerusalem, begins Nov. 9.

The daughter of Gerald and Gloria Morris of North York, she is leaving her job as senior writer on international affairs (and sometimes deputy foreign editor) for Maclean's magazine.

Morris' return to Jerusalem is bashert. It was her first visit to Israel with her family at age 14 that inspired her to become a journalist, and her first newspaper reporting job was with the Jerusalem Post in 1984.

She later freelanced in Toronto for a number of publications (including The CJN, and spent three years as a Toronto Star staffer. After her stint with the Star, she spent five years freelancing in Berlin and serving as Time magazine's Berlin correspondent. She then returned to Canada to join Maclean's staff.

Knight Ridder owns 31 dailies in the United States, including the Miami Herald, the Philadelphia Inquirer and the Detroit Free Press, and has 350 subscribers to its news service, including the Toronto Star. Morris says she expects that some of her stories will appear in the Star.

Morris cut her teeth in the news world at the Star, and says her Star assignment to cover the tearing down of the Berlin Wall was the watershed which plunged her into foreign reporting.

Freelanced for The CJN

She returned to Toronto, but in 1990, she left the Star. With one duffle bag and a laptop computer, she took off on her own for Berlin, where she freelanced for the CBC, the Financial Post, the Ottawa Citizen, Canadian Press, as well as many American newspapers and wire services. Along the way, she became fluent in German.

But she tired of the time it took to handle the business end of freelancing in Berlin and took on full-time work for Maclean's.

A graduate of University of Toronto Schools and McGill University, Morris majored in international politics and Middle Eastern affairs.

Fluent in Hebrew, she is boning up on her Arabic, since she will be responsible for covering the entire Middle East. In Jerusalem, she will have a four-bedroom house in Beit HaKerem. An apartment in Cairo is also reserved for her.

Before she leaves for her new job with her 4-year-old son, Misha, she will be busy winding up her affairs and selling her house in the Broadview-Danforth area.

Vandals strike Jewish sites in three cities

read: "Satan Rules" – and threats to return to the home, which had also been broken into about 14 months earlier, but without vandalism.

"It's like we were invaded," Jocelyne Bohbot told The CJN. "I came in and screamed, 'Oh my God!' "

"This was a real nice birthday for my daughter," Simon Bohbot said. "This time, they very maliciously left messages."

The Bohbots indicated that whoever invaded their house may have been staking out the property. The family left their home several hours before Yom Kippur began and did not return until about three hours after it ended – an absence of over 30 hours.

They said their home was probably entered through a basement window that they discovered was broken.

The family was at a loss to explain any possible motive behind the attack or its level of viciousness.

In Ottawa, officials at Ecole Maimonides are appealing to all Canadian Jews for financial help in repairing the French immersion Torah day school.

A local anonymous donor has agreed to match half of all funds raised until Oct. 25.

The fire, set after someone broke in through a window, was the second at the school in four years. There were no arrests made in a 1994 arson attack.

The latest blaze caused extensive damage, including from water and smoke.

The school's 100 or so students are faring well, said principal Rabbi Menachem Blum.

"Their spirits are good. We had a sukkah, and the Museum of Civilization [in Hull] opened their doors to us," he told The CJN.

Meantime, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has offered a $5,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for the attack at Toronto's Bloor Street JCC.

No one was hurt, but an estimated $10,000 in damage was caused by the fire, which was centered in a storage area at the south end of the building.

Police and the fire department were summoned to the scene by a passerby who called 911 around 1 a.m. After extinguishing the blaze, fire officials discovered that the plate glass window on the rear door to the storage area was smashed.

Two gas-soaked rags were found at the scene. A two-foot stick with a swivel device on it that was used to start the fire was also found, said Det. Sgt. James Ramer, the police hate crimes liaison officer with 14 Division in Toronto.

Noting that the attack took place during a Jewish holiday (Sukkot) and that there were similar, earlier arson incidents in Ottawa, police immediately treated the Bloor JCC fire as a hate crime, Ramer said.

"CJC will work cooperatively with the Toronto Police Services and the Bloor JCC to apprehend those responsible for this crime," said Ellen Cole, chair of community relations for Congress' Ontario region. "This was an attack on one of our key institutions."

Attack on Sukkot

Cole noted that "in the past, these attacks had been known to occur around Jewish holidays."

Bloor JCC director Bill Emery said that in his 11 years at the facility, he could recall no other incidents of arson. On one occasion, a bomb threat was called in, and another time someone daubed an outside wall with "a hard-to-decipher slogan" that may have been anti-Semitic.

Emery said his initial "gut reaction" – one shared by many at the centre – was that the fire was a case of simple vandalism without racial motivation. "I think it's a case of being downtown," he said.

Emery noted that in the past, the Bloor JCC and its neighbors had experienced broken windows and kicked-in doors. But, he added, "this is a serious business. We're glad police are stepping up their patrols of the building [and] are treating this as a hate crime."

Prior to the High Holy Days, Congress hosted a security meeting in the Lipa Green Building for representatives of various Jewish organizations and agencies, and security precautions during the holidays were discussed. Police from Toronto, York and Durham regions attended, as did officers of the Ontario Provincial Police. The pre-holiday security meeting has become standard procedure in the Jewish community.

In the wake of the attack on the Bloor JCC, "Congress will consider whether to issue a security advisory alert," to warn Jewish agencies to be "more vigilant," Cole said.

That might include warning employees and users of the buildings to "look out for new people."

Emery said, "Right now, there is no time when there is no one in the building."

The storage area was a charred mess and a $5,000 trampoline was damaged, as was other "circus equipment," including rigging for a trapeze. Thanks to the quick response of the fire department, fire damage to the building was minor, Emery said.

It was too early to determine the full extent of the damage to equipment, he added.

Meanwhile, the Bohbots, as well as David Sultan, community relations director of Canadian Jewish Congress' Quebec region, expressed concern that it took police 14 hours to respond to the family's call.

Constable Fradet said that was probably because the family dialed 911, a central police line staffed by civilians, who advised the Bohbots to wait until morning because there was no personal injury or threat to life involved.

But the Bohbots feel police should have responded much faster.

"When the police officer came to the door, her jaw just dropped," Simon Bohbot said.

Police said their investigation will continue.

When Hilary Prusznowski lost her child to cancer, and her friend Brenda lost her child to Riley-Day syndrome they wanted to keep their kids' hope alive – that other kids wouldn't have to go through such pain and suffering.

For the past two years, Hilary and Brenda have hosted an annual fund raising dinner and auction. The Carrie & Adam Dream Fund Dinner and Silent Auction has raised over $200,000 for two programs at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto: Paediatric Oncology (cancer) Research and the Therapeutic Clown Program. The latter, only the second of its kind in Canada, involves clowns and helps children deal with the loneliness and fear of staying in the hospital.

As one co-volunteer tells it, "Hilary is so passionate and dynamic in speaking about her vision, it's hard not to get involved."

Hilary works for Royal Bank in Metro Toronto. She's just one of many Royal Bank staff across Canada who take time out to help in their communities. And we'd just like to take this opportunity to thank them for doing what they do.

Concordia U launches Jewish studies program

MONTREAL — Concordia University, through its Campaign for a New Millennium, has established the Concordia Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

The institute combines academic research with an outreach program serving the Montreal Jewish community.

It became a reality, thanks to the generosity of Andrea and Charles Bronfman and Seagram Company Ltd., who jointly provided $1 million to the university's capital campaign.

According to the institute's acting director, Norma Joseph, "Concordia has been doing groundbreaking research on the Canadian Jewish experience. We now have a real opportunity to put our knowledge into practice, to the benefit of the community."

Students will work within community agencies and associations through an internship program, while pursuing their research activities.

Some of the funding will be directed to graduate fellowships. "Graduate work is expensive, and many of our brightest young men and women are unable to pursue higher studies without financial support," said Joseph.

The institute will also offer seminars and lectures to the general public. A course titled The Canadian Jewish Experience will be taught by Ira Robinson, in cooperation with the Jewish Public Library beginning in January.

More than 400 young adults and community supporters danced into the early hours of the morning, to music provided by the Shorasheem Band..

Established in 1996, SEC, an international, non-profit, youth organization, has more than 40 volunteers, one staff member and many community supporters.

SEC's mandate is to create educational and social events, and bring Jewish young people together in comfortable settings where they can mingle and become involved in community causes.

Esther Benquesus, one of SEC's founders, says that among the centre's goals are a quarterly newsletter, a second annual Shabbaton, continuing a series of book club meetings, and the creation of a Web page.

Vancouver Federation changes funding process

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) is switching from an agency-based to a program-based method of funding local services.

The goal is to show donors to the Lower Mainland's Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign how their contributions are spent.

Mitch Gilbert, JFGV's director of planning and community services, said in an interview that the new system was used this year to allocate $1.8 million for the 1998-99 fiscal year (Sept. 1-Aug. 30).

"The board of Federation had been discussing switching to program-based allocation for years," Gilbert said. "The board decided in the spring of 1997 to go to the new system."

Since JFGV was formed in 1986, he said, it has allocated funds from the campaign directly to its constituent agencies (currently 21, including day and supplemental schools). Under the old method, each agency submitted its budget to an eight-person allocations planning committee (APC) of the federation's board.

The APC looked at all the budgets presented to it, and then divided up the available funds among the agencies.

Under the new system, Gilbert said, the agencies submit applications for each of the programs they administer. The APC then meets two or three times a week over the next three months to sift through the applications it receives. The committee writes a report containing its recommendations, which it presents to the federation's full board of directors. Finally, the board votes on the committee's recommendations and makes the allocations.

Gilbert said the allocations are made from five "envelopes," or funding areas:

- Infrastructure – a predetermined "core grant" for each of the three largest agencies supported by the campaign – JFGV itself, the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver and the Jewish Family Service Agency;
- Social services – for poverty relief, immigrant resettlement and seniors programs;
- Education – for formal Jewish education, including day and supplemental schools, and for the first time, the Jewish Education Council;
- Youth – for youth programs and camping bursaries;
- Arts and culture – for Jewish history programs and the annual Jewish film festival.

Gilbert said the federation board decided to switch to program-based allocation so that donors to the CJA campaign can get a better idea of how their money is being spent.

He said the new method of allocation allows JFGV to play a more proactive role in the community. "Federation is not here just to raise money. We're also here to build the community. In partnership with the agencies, the new system lets us point to the programs and say, 'Those are the services that are needed.'"

Barry Corrin, executive director of Jewish Family Service Agency (JFSA), told The CJN he understands the desire of donors and funders to monitor contributions to the campaign. "I know what it's like, because I'm a donor, too," Corrin said.

For program-based allocation to be effective, Corrin said, there needs to be a process in place that accurately determines the spending priorities of the community.

"Otherwise, there is the possibility that real community needs will be missed," Corrin said. "The agencies are often in the best position to determine what the real needs of the community are."

Gabe Meranda, executive director of Vancouver B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation, said Hillel has an advantage over some other agencies in the Lower Mainland. "We're unique. We target a particular demographic group – Jewish university students – that nobody else serves. As a result, the competition for dollars from the youth envelope isn't as fierce, even though Hillel still has to sell its programs to Federation."

Hamilton UJA campaign up

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — After raising $890,000 in 1997-98, organizers hope this year's local UJA campaign will break the $900,000 barrier.

"We have the potential. If everyone gives this year what they gave last year and comes through, we'll go over $900,000," said 1998-99 campaign co-chair Al Rams. Cele Steinberg is this year's other co-chair.

The 1997-98 United Jewish Appeal campaign was the most successful in recent years, according to Rams.

Thanks to last year's successful campaign, the federation was able to increase allocations to all local Jewish schools this year, Hamilton-Wentworth Jewish Federation executive director Patricia Tolkin Eppel said.

This year's campaign is already "off to a very, very good start," Rams said, noting that past campaign results indicate "we've been giving a little more each year."

The campaign opened with a recent concert by the Israeli singing group Yovel: Israel at 50 (part of its cross-country tour).

This year, Hamilton is continuing with its "Plus Giving" project, which allows donors to designate 50 percent of any amount they give over and above their pledge to a beneficiary organization of their choice.

The program has proven so successful that other communities are adopting the idea, Tolkin Eppel said.

Sandy Morris and Vivienne Epstein co-chair the Women's Division this year, "and there is a large UJA cabinet overseeing the campaign," Tolkin Eppel said.

New to this year's campaign is a Youth Division, headed by former Women's Division co-chair Lynne Czutrin. At the other end of the scale, said Tolkin Eppel, is Ben Davine, who at 87 is one of the oldest canvassers and still going strong.

In other news, the Legacy Endowment Fund was recently launched as part of an evening honoring former Hamiltonian Dr. Myron Scholes, the 1997 Nobel laureate in economics. The Myron Scholes Nobel Fund for Jewish Education was established in his honor.

Also, 12 members of the Hamilton community will attend this year's General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations in Jerusalem in November, the largest contingent ever. Heading the group will be former federation president David Steinberg and and his wife Cele.

Bonds honors volunteers

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — A granddaughter's recollections of her famous grandfather highlighted the recent Hamilton State of Israel Bonds Women's Division luncheon honoring five volunteers for their years of dedicated community service.

The granddaughter was author Bel Kaufman; her grandfather was the great Yiddish writer and humorist Shalom Aleichem.

An English professor and author of the bestseller Up The Down Staircase, Kaufman is still amazingly active at age 87. "I am still so busy and so full of energy I have no time to grow old. When I have time, I shall sit down and grow old.

She captivated the more than 200 guests at Adas Israel Synagogue with warmth, wit and her obvious affection for her grandfather.

Shalom Aleichem "loved the sound of laughter," Kaufman said. "And the sound of laughter is the sound of survival, especially for us Jews. The essence of his humor was thumbing his nose at adversity. Shalom Aleichem did not depend on what happens, but on what people say. He begins with laughter, but makes us think."

The writer spent the last 1½ years of his life "in a shabby apartment in the Bronx," Kaufman said. He died in 1916 at age 57. Thousands followed his coffin at his funeral.

He "left a remarkable legacy of laughter in his will," Kaufman said. He commanded his family to read his stories every year on the anniversary of his death, which "to this day is an inviolable tradition in our family."

Honorees Tishelle Adelman, Stephanie McLean, Flora Rams and Sarah Rochwerg all spoke briefly and lovingly of growing up in homes with parents who instilled in them a love of Judaism and an ethic of service to their community.

The fifth honoree, Holocaust survivor Nadia Rosa, dedicated her honor to her many cousins who did not survive the war.

The Hebrew word for charity, Rosa noted, is tzedakah, which is derived from tzedek, meaning righteousness. "All my life," Rosa said, "I have tried to do the right thing... to be true to my principles."

Judy Schwartz gave the tribute and made the presentation to the honorees; past honoree Dolly Cohen spoke on behalf of Israel Bonds; and Dodi Weill, co-chair, national Women's Division State of Israel Bonds, Canada, and Cheryl Greenbaum, president, Jewish Federation of Hamilton-Wentworth, brought greetings.

Hamilton Bonds Women's Division co-chairs, Sandra Fuss and Marcia Halpren, opened the meeting and introduced the speaker.

How MPs spent their summer vacation

OTTAWA — So what did you do for your summer vacation? Part 2.

After another arduous summer of barbeques and ribbon cutting, MPs have returned to the House of Commons, and senators – at least most of them – have returned to the upper chamber.

The business of government has, at last, resumed.

Here's an update on what's been happening with some of the colorful cast of characters around Parliament Hill we introduced you to over the past year:

• Jewish Liberal MP Jacques Saada has received a couple of promotions.

The Tunisian-born rookie backbencher has been appointed parliamentary secretary to Solicitor General Andy Scott, beating out several other Quebec MPs.

Saada, elected last year in the Montreal-area riding of Brossard-La Prairie, was already regarded as an up-and-comer in Liberal circles. The fluently bilingual MP was chosen by Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy to head a Canadian fact-finding mission of parliamentarians to the troubled Mexican region of Chiapas and was co-chair of the biennial Liberal party convention that gave Prime Minister Jean Chretien an overwhelming vote of confidence.

Now, as parliamentary secretary, he'll fill in for Scott during question period, and shepherd legislation through the Commons.

Saada was also named as chair of the Canadian section of the Canada-United States Permanent Joint Board on Defence, which meets twice a year to discuss defence and security issues with representatives of the U.S. State Department and armed forces.

Though by no means a sure ticket to cabinet, the recent appointments are another sign he has caught Chretien's eye. As the respected Hill Times reported recently, "Mr. Saada seems to be in favor with the movers and shakers on Parliament Hill."

• Brash Reform (as in Preston Manning) aide Ezra Levant had an interesting and controversial summer job; he managed Reform's campaign for the upcoming Senate election in Alberta.

The Calgary native, Manning's special assistant who helps put words into the Opposition Leader's mouth for question period, returned to his home province.

He coordinated the selection of candidates for this month's vote, helped raise funds, planned advertising and, as he puts it, "hassled senators" all summer.

"It was a fun summer. It was good grassrooty stuff. Just travelling to every nook and cranny and talking about Senate reform, I put a lot of miles on the car," says Levant, a charter member of Reform's snack pack, a group of young MPs and backroomers aptly named because of their love of talking politics while eating fast food.

In typical fashion, Levant was anything but understated.

Lawyers for Conservative Senator Ron Ghitter have served Levant, the party and MP Rob Anders with a notice threatening a defamation lawsuit unless he gets a formal apology for comments in a successful fundraising letter sent to thousands of Albertans.

The four-page letter invited donations to "clean out the Senate stables...because Alberta shouldn't have to put up with Ron Ghitter a minute longer than we have to."

"Bring it on, let's put the Senate on trial, that's my point of view," says Levant.

• Intergovernmental Affairs Minister Stephane Dion, who visited Israel this summer, won the critical Supreme Court of Canada ruling he had been seeking.

The country's top court ruled in August that Quebec did not have the right – either under domestic or international law – to unilaterally separate from the rest of Canada. Surprisingly, the Supreme Court did acknowledge that there was a legal obligation on the rest of the country to negotiate secession if a "clear majority" of Quebecers decided after a clear referendum question that they want to leave.

Dion and two staffers spent a dizzying week touring and meeting with officials of all political stripes, including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and PLO chief Yasser Arafat.

Dion said afterwards, he came to understand how complex Israel's problems are for such a tiny country.

"I would not like to exchange our problems with them," the university professor commented.

Interestingly, with Arafat now threatening to unilaterally declare an independent Palestinian state, Netanyahu may soon come knocking on Dion's door for advice.

• And Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray...what else can you say but he keeps on ticking.

After a scary bout with cancer a few years ago, the longest-serving MP continues to flawlessly fill in for Chretien in the Commons and coordinate Canada's plans for the millennium.

Though he has lost several key staffers over the past few months, he shows no signs of slowing down or deciding to end a remarkable political career.

Jewish calendars for the millennium

By ROSE KLEINER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — An essential part of a Jewish home, or office, the Jewish calendar is a daily link to our heritage. It holds our plans and schedules within the framework of a Hebrew month and day. It gives us candlelighting times for the Sabbath and holidays, Torah readings and other information that keeps us attuned to the rhythms of Jewish life.

Calendars which are illustrated with beautiful Judaic artwork add yet another dimension to our environment. They serve as a mini-gallery in our home or office, bringing us images of priceless and rare works of art, and Judaica pieces which are housed in museums often too distant for us to frequent.

This year's calendars, being the last of the millennium, have a good chance of being collector's items someday.

All the calendars below continue through December 1999. All list Jewish and secular holidays and candlelighting times for major cities in the U.S. and Canada.

The British Library's vast collection of Hebrew manuscripts is the subject of Pomegranate's Illuminations – A Jewish Calendar from the British Library. The illustrations come from the Barcelona Haggadah, one of the most beautiful and important illuminated texts in the British Library collection.

Completed in mid-to-late 14th century it is decorated with images of holiday rituals and biblical scenes. It serves as a valuable source of information on Jewish costume, ritual and musical life in medieval Spain. The vibrant colors and imagery in the illustrations contrast sharply with the simplicity of the costumes worn by the figures depicted.

An 1850 oil painting of Simchat Torah celebrations in a Leghorn, Italy synagogue, by English painter Solomon A. Hart shows the magnificence of the architecture, art and costumes in Italian Jewish life of the period.

Other fascinating items in this calendar include a Persian Ketubah (1898), written in Persian and decorated with Hebrew passages in watercolor and gold paint. A floral New Year Greeting card printed in Germany before 1939 and a silver Chanukah menorah, from 19th century Vienna both speak to us of beauty and history.

This calendar lists Jewish holidays through the year 2004, and contains the blessings over the candles for Shabbat and holidays, in transliterated Hebrew with English translation.

Bursts of brilliant color characterize A Calendar for the Jewish Year 1998-99 (Universe) with its illustrations of illuminated manuscripts from the Collection of the Library of the Jewish Theological Seminary. The library, founded in 1893, contains one of the world's largest Hebraica and Judaica manuscript collections.

An international array of brightly colored Hebrew manuscripts from many different periods fills the pages of this calendar. The Song of Songs manuscript, from the Rothschild Mahzor, comes from Florence, 1492. Another manuscript is from 1853 Persia. Images from the Corfu Mahzor (1709) literally burst with color. Other beautiful manuscripts come from Mannheim, Germany (1736), Isfahan, Iran (1867) and India (1875).

Two attractive desk calendars merit special attention. The Jewish Calendar 5759 (Universe) has full-color illustrations of remarkable works of art and artifacts from the B'nai Brith Klutznick National Jewish Museum in Washington D.C.

As we turn the pages of this calendar we see treasures such as the silver Havdalah set by artist Ludwig Wolpert, a painting by an Argentine Jewish artist, which gives a concise, visual summary of Argentine Jewish life, a silver wedding plate from Persia (19th century), engraved with traditional Hebrew and Aramaic wedding chants.

One cannot help but marvel at the 19th century Etrog holder that is made of a carved coconut shell and set on a graceful silver base.

A feature unique to this calendar is the very practical Jewish holiday chart, giving at a glance the various characteristics which distinguish each holiday. This includes the date, candle blessings, Biblical readings, the holiday's major theme and its historical and seasonal significance.

Another desk calendar that will bring a veritable exhibition of Judaica into the home or office is the Jewish Engagement Calendar 1999 (Hugh Lauter Levin Associates). Filled with stunning Judaica illustrations from the Jewish museum collection (New York) this calendar lists Jewish holidays through to 2013.

A most timely gift for youngsters is My Very Own Jewish Calendar which can charm adults as well. Full of all sorts of information and trivia it keeps us aware of more than just Hebrew dates. We learn such diverse things as the origin of the names of the Hebrew months, the improvements synagogues have made to be accessible to physically-disabled congregants, the meaning of terms as "amen", "hiddur mitzvah", "pidyon haben" and "havdalah" to name but a few.

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Kenny Colman, a former Winnipegger, has recently re-released his Dreamscape album as a CD on the Justin Time label out of Montreal.

Colman's career as a jazz singer has taken him from New York to Las Vegas to Monte Carlo. He has appeared in numerous clubs and major talk shows, and has been compared to Tony Bennett by Frank Sinatra.

Colman grew up in Winnipeg in the 1930s and '40s as Kenny Ludwig, before his family moved to Vancouver. In the late 1950s, he travelled to Bermuda where he worked as a disc jockey.

Colman originally recorded Dreamscape with the London Symphony Orchestra more than 10 years ago. The songs included ballads such as Laura, Angel Eyes, Stardust and As Times Goes By. His own favorite is When Joanna Loved Me.

He is currently promoting the CD across the country and working on a new jazz-oriented album for a fall release.

- מה אמר האל שבוע אחרי שיצר את אדם? - "אני בטוח שאני יכול לעשות משהוא יותר מוצלח"
- מדוע קשה לנשים למצוא גברים שהם גם רגישים, גם איכפתיים ונם נראים טוב? כי לגברים כאלה בדרך כלל יש כבר חבר צמוד
- מה ההבדל בין גבר ואי טי? - אי טי לפחות מנסה לצלצל הביתה.

Branksome Motivates Students to Succeed

As each member of the Branksome Hall Class of 1998 went off to University last month, she took with her the solid academic foundation provided by the demanding university-preparatory curriculum she received at Branksome.

The Branksome curriculum instills a love of learning that motivates students to succeed and inspires them to distinguish themselves. During the past academic year, Banksome students scored in the top 0.5% among all Canadian students in math contests; placed in the top 2% in an Ontario-wide biology competition; were among the top 3% nationally in chemistry competitions; received myriad scholarships; and were invited to attend universities such as Princeton, Tufts, Brown, the University of Michigan, Queens University, University of Western Ontario and the University of Toronto.

Not just the graduating year students benefit from Branksome's high standards. All 850 girls from Junior Kindergarten learn and explore in a nurturing environment which combines the highest quality academic, athletic and co-curricular programs. Branksome students are also taught the importance of community involvement. Last year, Branksome was the top fundraising school for the MS Read-A-Thon in all of Canada, raising over $20,000 for multiple sclerosis research and services. Branksome also won an award for its continued commitment to cancer research through the school's annual participation in the Terry Fox Run.

Applications are now being accepted for the 1999/2000 academic year. For more information on tours, interviews and financial aid, please contact the Admissions Office at (416) 920-9741 ext. 268.

Rift growing between militant right, NRP

By AMIRA SEGEV
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A growing rift is discernible between extra-parliamentary militant right-wing groups and the National Religious Party (NRP), their major representative in the Knesset, in anticipation of the upcoming Israeli-Palestinian summit in the United States.

NRP representatives emerged from a meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu claiming they were conciliated, their faith restored. But at the same time, the joint leadership of the right-wing groups – which ceased their activity in the wake of Netanyahu's election in May 1996 – met yesterday for the first time since the election.

Effectively, the coalition of militant right-wing groups has been re-established, as their faith in Netanyahu's leadership erodes. The coalition includes the Land of Israel Front of Knesset members, the Yesha Council of settlements, Chabad and others.

Following a lengthy meeting with Netanyahu, NRP spokespeople dropped the uncompromising tone that had characterized their statements in recent days.

"We did not demand that the prime minister add one of our representatives to the Washington delegation," Transport Minister Shaul Yahalom said after the meeting. "The prime minister is perfectly capable of safeguarding the interests of the nation and the state."

Netanyahu promised the NRP that he will convene a special cabinet meeting before leaving for the United States.

He assured the delegation that in the agreement he would insist on the principle of mutuality, meaning that the Palestinians must uphold their part of the deal: annulment of the clauses in the Palestinian Covenant that call for Israel's destruction and extradition of murderers, and that he would further insist on no harm to the settlements.

Education minister and NRP leader Yitzhak Levy said that Netanyahu's clarifications were such "that they can definitely leave the government intact." Netanyahu, he said, "told the NRP group that Israel would demand that the third redeployment not exceed one percent" – thus tacitly admitting that the NRP had reconciled itself to the 13 percent pullback of the second redeployment.

Levy reported that Netanyahu said "he does not intend to arrive in the United States feeling intimidated. 'If pressure is applied, I can withstand it,' the prime minister assured us."

Yahalom said the scope of the second pullback had not been discussed, "but we made it clear to him that if the territorial contiguity [between the settlements] is affected, and if even one of our 160 settlements is harmed, we will not be with him."

A senior member of the Yesha Council, Uri Ariel, said that "the right wing, which worked so hard for [Netanyahu's] election, is now coming out against him. He is relying on the Americans, so the situation is clear."

The right-wing activists decided yesterday to maintain a vigil outside the prime minister's residence during his stay in the United States. A second decision being considered is to demonstrate outside the homes of the three ministers who will accompany Netanyahu – Yitzhak Mordechai, Ariel Sharon and Natan Sharansky – until their return.

Sharon has long been considered the settlers' patron, and this would be the first-ever demonstration against him by right-wing militants.

"He is our minister," Yesha Council director-general Aharon Domb said. "This is a very problematic proposal for us. But we are afraid that afterward he will say, 'I was wrong,' as he did after Yamit" – referring to Sharon's order to level the settlement of Yamit in Sinai after Israel signed the peace treaty with Egypt – "and we don't want another mistake."

Meanwhile, Meimad, the dovish religious movement, yesterday called on the NRP to stop practising "political extortion" against the prime minister and cease its efforts to prevent the agreement.

Pope beatifies controversial Croat

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Pope John Paul II has beatified a controversial cardinal revered by Croatians as an anti-Communist martyr but reviled by others as a fascist collaborator.

The pope, on a recent two-day visit to Croatia, proclaimed Zagreb's World War II archbishop Alojzije Stepinac a "blessed" of the Roman Catholic Church – the step before sainthood – before an ecstatic crowd of 350,000 at a shrine near Zagreb.

The ceremony consecrated Stepinac as a Croatian national symbol as well as a Catholic religious hero.

To illustrate the ceremony's national and religious purposes, Croatian President Franjo Tudjman, whose policy often pays homage to Croatia's national identity, joined the pope on the altar at the end of the beatification mass to the strains of the national anthem.

The beatification took place despite protests by the Serbian government, and a call by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre to put it off "until after the completion of an exhaustive study of Stepinac's wartime record."

Historians differ sharply as to Stepinac's role under the regime of the Ustashe, the fascists who ruled Croatia as a Nazi puppet state from 1941 to 1945.

Yugoslavia's hard-line postwar Communist government jailed the anti-Communist Stepinac for collaborating with the Ustashe regime, which staged forced conversions and massacres of Serbs, Jews and Gypsies.

After a show trial, he was sentenced in 1946 to 16 years of hard labor. He died under house arrest in 1960.

As archbishop of Zagreb in 1941, Stepinac, who admitted feeling nationalist fervor, had supported the regime of Ustashe leader Ante Pavelic. But by 1942 he withdrew his backing and denounced its policy.

Many Serbs, who are Orthodox Christians, continue to view Stepinac as a war criminal and as a symbol of Croatian Catholics who openly backed the Ustashe.

Polish government slammed over crosses

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — A group of prominent Polish intellectuals and an association of Polish war veterans have criticized the Polish government for failing to take action that would end the crisis over the crosses erected by Catholic fundamentalists at Auschwitz.

Six eminent Polish intellectuals, including Nobel Prize-winning poets Czeslaw Milosz and Wislawa Szymborska, published an open letter to Polish Prime Minister Jerzy Buzek last week calling for government intervention to halt the crisis.

The letter, published in the newspaper Gazeta Wyborcza, said the controversy over the hundreds of crosses erected by Catholic extremists since July "disturbs Poles, insults Jews and causes concern in world opinion."

The militants who claim to be "defending" the crosses, actually want to provoke unrest and conflict in Poland, the letter said.

It urged Buzek to step in and "stop the provocation" at Auschwitz.

A Krakow-based association of "veterans and freedom fighters," meanwhile, issued a statement supporting the intellectuals' letter, according to the Polish news agency PAP.

PAP said the association represented some 20 organizations. It said the veterans protested "the incomprehensible passivity of Polish state authorities in the face of the protracted conflict" at Auschwitz.

"The government is responsible for tolerating this political and religious provocation which causes public anxiety."

At the same time, however, extreme right-wing activists, including Leszek Bubel, one of the leaders of the campaign to erect the crosses, have published the first issue of what they said will be a monthly magazine called Now, Poland.

Stanislaw Krajewski, a member of the board of the Union of Jewish Religious Communities in Poland and a consultant to the American Jewish Committee, called the magazine "frightening" because of its apparently wide distribution, anti-Semitic content and aggressive tone.

The Week in Israel

Oct. 5

• An Arab League official accused Israel of being behind Turkey's row with Syria and said the Jewish state stands to gain from the crisis. (Turkey has demanded Syria expel the leader of the Kurdish Workers' Party (PKK). The PKK is fighting the Turks for independence.)

Oct. 6

• Chemicals sold to the Biological Institute of Nes Ziona, which were being carried aboard an El Al plane that crashed in Holland in 1992 were not part of any chemical weapons, according to a statement from the Prime Minister's Office.

• Haifa police arrested 157 stowaways hidden on a ship in the Haifa harbor. Virtually all those detained were Moldavians who had come to seek work in Israel illegally.

Oct. 7

• The National Student Union announced plans to boycott the opening of the university academic year on Oct. 25, demanding that the treasury issue orders to lower tuition by 20 percent. The treasury does not intend to deal with the question until 2002.

• About 400 pro-Syrian Druze from Majdal Shams in the Golan Heights marked the 25th anniversary of the Yom Kippur War with a demonstration condemning Turkey for the recent tension with Syria and for its ties with Israel.

Oct. 8

• The spiritual leader of the Ethiopian Jewish community died at the age of 92. Kes Menashe Zemro was described as "this generation's greatest leader," by Knesset member Adisu Massala.

Oct. 9

• The "kitchen cabinet" reached an understanding that a proposed new highway in the Judean Desert will have to be moved in order to accommodate a Palestinian nature reserve east of Hebron.

Israel, Palestinian Authority near agreement

Some cite Netanyahu's coalition difficulties; others point to the premier's reluctance to abandon tracts of the biblical homeland.

And even among the more optimistic observers, there are warnings that even if Netanyahu and Arafat sign an agreement under the watchful eye of President Bill Clinton, there is no guarantee it will be implemented.

Israel and the Palestinians, nudged on by American officials, are inching closer to a long-elusive accord under which Israel will redeploy from a further 13 percent of the West Bank in return for stepped-up security arrangements with the Palestinian Authority.

During a Sept. 28 meeting with Netanyahu and Arafat at the White House, Clinton proposed a summit in the middle of October in Washington to sign the accord and to agree on methods for pursuing the permanent-status negotiations, which are already long overdue.

Albright, who visited the region to lay the groundwork for that summit, told reporters that Arafat and Netanyahu made "significant and substantial progress" on a host of issues, including security arrangements and the further Israeli redeployment.

But Albright also cautioned that much work remains to be done after she met with Arafat and Netanyahu for more than three hours at the Erez Crossing between Israel and the Gaza Strip.

Clinton said that he believes the Israelis and Palestinians are "close enough" in their stances to be able to reach an agreement at the Washington summit which is slated to begin this week Oct. 15 at the Wye Plantation, a conference site on the eastern shore of Maryland.

Speaking with reporters after he met with Arafat, Netanyahu agreed with Albright's assessment of progress in the talks.

But he added a cautionary note.

"Although we have climbed up on a steep hill, the hill is still ahead of us," Netanyahu said.

The fragility of the situation is exemplified by security incidents that have been occurring almost daily.

Among them were a grenade attack on soldiers in Hebron on Yom Kippur and a mysterious explosion of a car bomb near Ramallah.

Israel imposed a closure on the West Bank and Gaza Strip after security officials warned that Hamas is planning to carry out a major terror attack against the Jewish state.

The army chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Shaul Mofaz, and senior Shin Bet and Mossad officials have all warned the cabinet that militant Palestinians are planning major terrorist attacks to derail the peace process.

Indeed, the terrorists' efforts represent the gravest danger to the process. A terror attack inside Israel with heavy civilian casualties could instantly turn Clinton's best-laid plans to ashes.

It is perhaps the understanding that this is the case -- coupled with a healthy dose of skepticism based on almost two years of diplomatic stagnation -- that has left the Israeli public skeptical about the latest diplomatic activity.

The Netanyahu-Arafat meeting in New York on Sept. 27, their first in nearly a year, left many Israelis unimpressed as they made their preparations for Yom Kippur. Indeed, the Israeli media were almost indifferent in reporting the meeting.

And the two leaders' White House meeting and photo-op the next day with Clinton were widely dismissed here as the president's attempt to demonstrate on camera that he was still functioning despite the Monica Lewinsky sex scandal.

Official spokespersons on both sides who carefully played down expectations contributed to a general sense of wait and see.

But one group that is not willing to wait is the Israeli right.

After his return from Washington, Netanyahu faced angry hard-liners in his cabinet.

Rabbi Yitzhak Levy, the minister of education and National Religious Party (NRP) leader, reportedly warned him at a cabinet meeting that if he returns from the proposed mini-summit with Clinton and Arafat having divested Israel of more West Bank land, he would find himself divested of his government.

Levy and his NRP colleague, Transportation Minister Shaul Yahalom, demanded that the premier submit any accord to the cabinet before signing it on Israel's behalf.

Netanyahu refused to give this commitment.

The NRP ministers and other cabinet hawks are now focusing their efforts on the issues of security and reciprocity that remain outstanding in the negotiations.

They acknowledge, reluctantly, that Netanyahu has already acceded to the American proposal for the 13 percent redeployment.

Recently, a group of 10 right-wing Knesset members took out large ads in the major Israeli newspapers in which they warned the premier in an open letter against any territorial concession whatever.

"If the government decides to undertake any further withdrawal from the territories of Eretz Yisrael – we will no longer be party to your coalition," they said in the open letter. "We will make every effort to bring down the government."

In the letter, the 10 assert that the Palestinian Authority has not honored "a single one of the commitments it undertook in the Oslo accords."

Netanyahu has said repeatedly that once his security concerns are satisfied he will go ahead and conclude the deal, despite the political risk.

Some political observers discount that risk, pointing to the strong support that Netanyahu can effectively count on from the opposition Labor party.

But that bipartisan backing would presumably only be a short-term prospect.

Once the 12-week implementation period that is proposed for the new accord ends, Labor would doubtless resume its opposition role.

If the hard-liners persist in their attempts to topple Netanyahu – in order to put up their own candidate for premier in a new election – the government would be doomed.

As a result, politicians and analysts are once again assessing the prospects of a Likud-Labor unity government being created after the redeployment deal is finally concluded – if it is.

CIA chief puts spotlight on security during visit

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — CIA director George Tenet met last week with Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai to discuss various regional security issues, but their talk focused mainly on Israel's demand that the Palestinian Authority clearly demonstrate its commitment to systematically fighting terrorism.

Tenet is here to help promote the signing of a joint Israeli-Palestinian security memorandum.

Mordechai told Tenet that "Israel is sincere in its intention to reach an agreement with the Palestinians but insists that its national security and the personal security of its citizens be a foundation of every agreement."

The meeting was also attended by chief of staff Shaul Mofaz, Shin Bet director Ami Ayalon, and director of military intelligence Amos Malcha.

Military sources said yesterday that the recent wave of attempted terrorist acts in the territories and preparations for such actions, uncovered both by Israel and by the Palestinians, point to the extensive terrorist infrastructure set up by the Hamas in the territories over the last year.

Chief of Staff Mofaz made reference to this issue at the latest cabinet meeting, saying that the terrorist infrastructure in the territories is "far larger than we had imagined."

The security establishment recently expressed satisfaction at the agreements reached in talks with the Palestinians regarding the opening of an industrial park at the Karni crossing. Senior security sources said it is possible that after more than two years of negotiations, the road is finally clear for the industrial park to be opened.

The sources said the opening of the industrial park would be an immense boost to the Palestinian economy, which has stagnated since the Oslo accords were signed.

The sources noted that the details of the agreement have in effect been concluded for months, but that the Palestinian representatives are apparently delaying the signing until progress is achieved on the main front – the second West Bank pullback.

VIOLENCE IN HEBRON

A Palestinian woman joins the unrest in Hebron as she prepares to hurl a large stone at Israeli soldiers. At least seven Palestinians were wounded in three days of violence. The violence began after two hand grenades were thrown by a Palestinian at an Israeli military patrol operating in the Israeli-controlled sector close to the city's Jewish enclave. Islamic decree bans Arabs from serving in the IDF

By ALIZA ARBELI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A fatwa, or Islamic religious decree, has been issued prohibiting Bedouin and Arab citizens from serving in the Israel Defence Forces.

The decree was issued by Sheikh Abu Farakh from Rahat, the leader of the Islamic movement branch in the Negev. He is considered an influential spiritual leader among Bedouin in the south of the country.

"The fatwa rules that anyone who enlists in a conquering army, not only the IDF, shall be considered a heretic," Abu Farakh said.

Abu Farakh was speaking at a gathering of Negev Bedouin who support the Arabs of Umm al-Fahm, whose violent riots in the lower Galilee city last week were spurred by the army's appropriation of Arab farm land.

Umm al-Fahm Mayor Sheikh Raed Saleh belongs to Abu Farakh's flock.

Some 400 people attended the gathering, held in Lakia in the Negev, including Knesset members, mayors and a delegation of Arabs from the north of the country. According to the fatwa, any Arab or Bedouin who serves in the Israeli army is considered a heretic. He cannot be buried in a Muslim cemetery, and the community must force him to divorce his wife until he retracts his decision to serve.

Abu Farakh said he issued the decree after he learned that there were Bedouin soldiers among the forces who suppressed the riots in Umm al-Fahm, and that together with Jewish soldiers they stepped on the backs of Muslim worshippers and hurt their Arab brethren.

"In our sector, there is no mandatory draft," the cleric declared. "A situation has been created in which members of our community volunteer to serve in an army that expropriates their lands for training."

Infertility consultant stresses need for education

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Thorough, extensive and intelligent research on infertility is needed to help couples who are experiencing difficulty having a child, said Rhonda Levy, a corporate lawyer turned infertility consultant.

Speaking at a symposium on infertility recently at Women's College Hospital, Levy emphasized that couples must realize that a successful pregnancy does not just mean getting pregnant; it means, she said, delivering a live child.

Levy defined in vitro fertilization as a process whereby the woman's ovary is stimulated to produce more than one egg, after which the eggs are retrieved, sperm is injected into the cytoplasm of the egg or eggs, and the mixture is inserted into the uterus past the cervix.

Interpreting information is a very real problem, Levy said. Referring to in vitro fertilization statistics put out in 1997 by the Society for Artificial Reproductive Technology of the U.S. Centre for Disease Control, she noted that those statistics can be presented in different ways – from pregnancies resulting in immediate miscarriage, to eggs retrieved, to embryos transferred into a woman's body, to live births.

"The most reasonable statistics, are those gathered over a 12 month period," she said, as this method allows for those who achieve pregnancy and then miscarry.

Be aware that these statistics are only for U.S. clinics, she said, adding that Canadian figures are currently being collected.

It is also important when evaluating a program to make sure that the statistics are for women your age, as well as for those with the same reason for infertility.

In addition, those statistics are not the only measure of a program's quality, Levy said.

"Check the entry criteria," she advised. Some centres attract those with more difficult problems or those who have tried in vitro fertilization many times before; some only accept those with the best chance of being successful or have an age cutoff.

Medical staff must be meticulous, skilled, and experienced in micromanipulation, she said. Some facilities transfer many embryos, and couples must be aware of the dangers of multiple births.

Check also, she said, how aware they are of the process of "assisted hatching," in which a small hole is made in the covering around the embryo, making it easier for it to implant into the sides of the uterus. They should be willing to consider doing this procedure.

"You must become your own best advocate," Levy counselled.

Ellen Greenblatt, from the University of Toronto IVF Program, the Toronto Hospital and the Toronto Centre for Advanced Reproductive Technology, said there is a great deal of research being carried out on different methods of in vitro fertilization.

Some of these involve cryopreservation (freezing) of either eggs or sperm; recognition and enhancement of the role of the cytoplasm of the egg (cytoplasm is the liquid in the egg surrounding the genetic-bearing nucleus); allowing embryos to mature to some extent in the laboratory until they can be fertilized; transferring, not the egg, but the blastocyst (the fertilized egg that has already divided); the role of the endometrium (the lining of the uterus); and improving the follicle stimulating hormone (FSH) levels.

In reply to questions from the audience, Levy and Greenblatt said that donor eggs or sperm, and gestational carrying (one method of this is surrogate motherhood), while not actually illegal, are not actually legal, either.

"It is a gray area," Greenblatt said, explaining that the issue, besides its moral and ethical aspects, tends to revolve around the question of its being a commercial transaction.

If a woman comes in and says that she wants to give her extra eggs to someone as an act of kindness, or carry a baby for her sister, that seems to be acceptable, Levy and Greenblatt agreed.

Diverse Israeli films at AGO festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In honor of Israel's 50th anniversary, Cinematheque Ontario is presenting an Israeli film festival at the Art Gallery of Ontario from Oct. 22 to Nov. 1.

Composed of old and contemporary movies, notably documentaries and features, the festival is co-sponsored by Air Canada and Daniels Financial Corporation.

Here, in capsule form, is a sampler:

They Were Ten (Nov. 1 at 1 p.m.), billed as the first feature-length film made entirely by an Israeli cast and crew, was released in 1960, when the state was but 12 years old.

Directed by Baruch Dienar, and starring Leo Filler and Yisrael Rubinshik, it is set in late 19th century Palestine, depicted as a harsh land of bleak, unforgiving landscapes.

Based on the diaries of Zionist pioneers from Russia, They Were Ten focuses on a group of people – nine men and one woman – who've been given the task of building a colony on a remote hilltop in western Galilee.

Constant struggle is the lot of the newcomers, who live all jumbled together in a hut and who tend to burst into Hebrew folk songs after a hard day's work of clearing the rocky ground.

They must put up with heat, drought, hunger and disease, as well as inhospitable Arabs and a malevolent Ottoman Turkish policeman on horseback. In this sense, the film seems quite realistic in content.

The settlers' encounter with Palestinian Arabs in an adjacent village prefigures the Arab-Israeli conflict. Calling their Jewish neighbors the "children of death," some of the Arabs mock the Jews. "Look at them! Jewish farmers!"

More seriously, there are disputes over water and grazing rights and the theft of a horse. These confrontations spark a debate among the Jews as to whether they should resort to force to gain redress.

The film's view of Arabs, however, is not uniformly negative, as suggested by the growing friendship between a settler and the village sheik.

Though not always gripping, They Were Ten moves along briskly thanks to a taut and balanced script, a credible cast and exceptional cinematography.

Awodah (Oct. 25 at 1 p.m.), a relic from 1935 directed by Helmar Lerski, is nothing less than a paean to Jewish labor in pre-state Israel.

A perfect example of Zionist agitprop, the documentary is driven by ecstatic images of workers toiling under a blazing sun by the sweat of their brows. The classical score, performed with brio by the Budapest Symphony Orchestra, complements the film's idealistic mood.

The heroes, of course, are Jewish farmers ploughing the land, road builders breaking stones, bricklayers constructing homes and roughnecks drilling for water.

Awodah looks dated today, but it must have been stirring once upon a time.

Afula Express (Oct. 22 at 6:30 p.m.), which swept last year's Israeli Academy Awards in six categories, including best picture, is fresh and expressive, a contemporary and colloquial dramatic comedy by Julie Shles.

The protagonists are David (Zvika Hadar) and Batya (Esti Zackheim), a young, unmarried couple living in a tenement in southern Tel Aviv.

David, a car mechanic, wants to follow his dream and become a famous magician. Batya, a supermarket cashier with a practical bent who yearns for a "normal life," is skeptical of his ambition. In addition to this disagreement, the fractious lovers quarrel over marriage and the right place to settle down.

By any yardstick, Afula Express is brash and likeable, with salt-of-the-earth characters whose naturalness is never less than disarming. Among them are Shimon, David's unemployed friend, and Natasha, a Russian prostitute whose goal is to immigrate to America.

Zackheim, zaftig and appealing, steals the show with her gutsy acting.

Emile Habibi – I Stayed in Haifa (Nov. 1 at 3 p.m.) walked away with the 1997 Jerusalem Film Festival's documentary award. Dalia Karpel's sensitive and sympathetic portrait of an Israeli Arab writer and politician speaks volumes about the identity of Israel's Arab citizens.

Born in Haifa in 1922 into a Protestant family, Habibi was one of the leaders of the Communist party, prior to and after Israel's establishment, and served in the Knesset for 19 years. He was also a newspaper editor and a novelist, winning the Israel Prize in 1992, four years before his death of cancer.

In the movie, filmed just weeks before he died, Habibi – an advocate of Arab-Jewish reconciliation – discusses the past, expresses his hopes and dreams, and pays visits to old haunts in Haifa, Acre, Jerusalem and Ramallah.

The following movies will also be screened:

• The 92 Minutes of Mr. Baum, a black comedy by Assi Dayan, on Oct. 24 at 8:45 p.m.

• Palestine in 1896, a silent documentary by the Lumiere brothers, on Oct. 25 at 1 p.m.

• Life According to Agfa, a bruising drama starring Gila Almagor, on Oct. 25 at 2:30 p.m.

• *Fragments*Jerusalem*, a six-hour epic by Ron Havilio, on Oct. 26 at 6:30 p.m. and Oct. 27 at 6:30 p.m.

• Beyond the Walls, a hard-hitting prison drama, on Oct. 28 at 8:45 p.m.

• Avanti Popolo, a war film nominated for best foreign language movie at the 1986 Academy Awards, on Oct. 29 at 6:30 p.m.

• Siege, a psychological drama about a grieving widow after the Six Day War, on Oct. 29 at 8:15 p.m.

YIDDISH MUSIC GALORE

The Friends of Yiddish present an unforgettable evening of Yiddish song and dance with "one of the city's most exciting new talents...." He is Michael Smolash, fresh from his starring role in the smash stage hit Forever Plaid, accompanied by musicians Brian Katz on guitar and piano, and Jonno Lightstone on clarinet.

In a program called A Bisl Zun, Smolash sings songs of the Yiddish theatre and some selections — in Yiddish — from Forever Plaid. The concert is "followed by a nosh."

B'nai Brith Auditorium, 15 Hove St. Oct. 18, 7:30 p.m. Members free; guests $8. RSVP to Min, 905-709-4602.

Yiddish Music Two: The Cranbrooke Friendship Club of the United Jewish People's Order presents An Afternoon of Jewish Musical Heritage with Lenka Lichtenberg, singer, guitarist and pianist. Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave. Oct. 19, 12:30 p.m. $5. 416-789-5502.

New Bette Midler CD: Songstress Bette Midler returns to her roots and dishes out an eclectic mix of music in her latest CD, Bathhouse Betty. In this package, the inimitable "Divine Miss M" embraces such styles as Hawaiian music, rap, blues, old-fashioned and new-fangled jazz, and simple love ballads.

The CD's opening selection is the exquisitely-written Song of Bernadette, composed by Leonard Cohen, Bill Elliot and Jennifer Warnes. Fans of Warnes will remember her definitive version of the tune in Famous Blue Raincoat, her popular CD of Leonard Cohen songs of about 10 years ago.

Alas, Midler's interpretation of Song of Bernadette seems highly derivative of Warnes. That's a shame, because there are many worthwhile tunes, though none seem on the order of Wind Beneath My Wings or From A Distance.

Midler is in top form in the soft emotional ballad Lullabye in Blue, which was written by Brock Walsh and Adam Cohen. Could this be the same Adam Cohen who released a debut CD recently and who – you guessed it – is the son of poet-troubador Leonard Cohen of Montreal?

Standing Tall: Speaking of Montreal, Association of Jewish Artists in that city of continuing linguistic wars is planning an art exhibition, Soyons Fiers/Stand Tall, to combat "the increasing polarization of ethnic populations." The show opens Oct. 18, 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. at Decarie Square, 6900 Decarie Blvd., and runs Oct. 19 to Nov 1.

"We feel our group can build bridges by revealing our similarities and that our creative expressions are a gift to be shared; to show that we are more alike than we are different," an association press release asserts.

Out-of-Town Opening: Winnipeg Jewish Theatre presents The Immigrant, by Mark Harelik, recounting the story of two Russian Jews who immigrate to a small North American town in the 1900s. Oct. 15 to 25 at the Warehouse. $18-$25. 204-477-7478.

Toronto Arts Awards: Arts Toronto recently announced the recipients of this year's Toronto Arts Awards, presented annually to eight artists who have made a major contribution to the city's cultural life. Toronto's Jewish community should be proud to claim such a high proportion of the recipients as our own.

Winners are composer Louis Applebaum (Lifetime Achievement Award); novelist Matt Cohen (Writing & Publishing Award); composer John Weinzweig (Music Award); landscape architect Janet Rosenberg (Architecture & Design Award); dancer-choreographer Danny Grossman (William Kilbourn Award); ballet teacher Mavis Staines (Performing Arts Award); television actor Ken Finkleman (Media Arts Award); and artist Noel Harding (Visual Arts Award).

The awards presentation is Oct. 26 at the Atlantis Pavillion, Ontario Place. Tickets for a gala dinner and a show featuring film profiles of each recipient are $175. Show and party only, $35. 416-597-8223.

ROCHESTER COMMUNITY TO HOST MACCABI GAMES

Next August the Jewish community of Rochester, NY expects to be plenty busy. That's because the 20,000-to-25,000-strong community is preparing to host the North American JCC Maccabi Youth Games, a colossal endeavor that in its own way seems almost as challenging as any of the sporting events that the games will offer.

As many as 4,000 athletes are expected for the annual competition, and that means that 400 or 500 hosting families must be found, according to Judith Kaplan, president of the Rochester Jewish Community Center.

Last August the games were held in two cities, Detroit and Charlotte, so as not to overtax the resources of any one community, and in 1997 no less than six cities shared the hosting responsibilities. But as solo host, the Rochester JCC hopes to reap all the rewards associated with the Maccabi Games even as it takes on the major logistical challenge alone.

"It's more than a sports event," says Kaplan. "Infused in every part is a celebration of our Jewish values and our Jewish identity."

Jacob Schreiber, program director for the Rochester JCC, says the games are bound to strengthen the community. "Every single JCC that has hosted the Maccabi Games has reported how well they build community spirit and bring people out of the woodwork. It's a community-building experience in which the kids win and the community will become more numerous."

Numerically only about one-seventh the size of Toronto's community, Rochester seems to have a surprisingly full and impressive communal infrastructure, beginning with the JCC itself. At 48 pages, the JCC's Fall Program Guide is filled with activities from adult aquatics to a book festival to a theatre series.

Whereas the first Jewish 'Y's in America were instituted to introduce a generation of Jewish immigrants and their children to American life, Schreiber notes that modern JCCs are important instruments of Jewish continuity.

"The old Jewish 'Y' used to make Jews into Americans," he quips. "Now the JCC makes Americans into Jews."

It's not too worrisome to locals that Rochester's main Orthodox synagogue is known as the St. Regis Temple. Situated on St. Regis Drive, its full name is the Congregation Beth Kahneses Hachodosh.

The large Reform Temple, Brith Kodesh, holds one of the oldest Reform congregations in the country; it has just started a new Kolel or learning institution, based jointly on similar institutions in both Toronto and New York. "They're trying to see how a small city can adapt a big-city model to its purposes," Kaplan explains.

The major Conservative synagogue, Temple Beth El, has another Toronto connection: its pulpit once belonged to Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg, who later came to Toronto. Beth El has a membership of about 1,200 families and congregants do not normally have to worry about finding a tenth man since some 500 people attend weekly Shabbat services.

There's also a strong Hillel presence on city campuses, a Hillel day school, a yeshiva and a girl's high school, a Judaica store (Traditions), a kosher bakery and a kosher butcher; Wegman's supermarket also has a large kosher section. A kosher cafeteria at the JCC is open weekdays from 8 a.m. to 3 p.m.

For the past two Passovers the community has held a large feminist seder; last year some 550 women attended. "We asked, 'Why is this night different than every other night?' Kaplan recalls. "The answer was, 'Because we don't have to cook.'"

Besides several sections of downtown, Jewish neighborhoods of Rochester include sections of Brighton, Pittsford and Henrietta. For further details about Jewish life in Rochester, pick up The Source, a 96-page guide distributed free at the JCC (716-461-2000). Members of Toronto's BJC or Bloor JCC are invited to show their membership cards for a one-time free visit to the Rochester JCC.

Professional coach focuses on running hockey school

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At age 28, Michael Lende was on the fast track to a career most hockey people can only dream about – coaching in the NHL.

Young Entrepreneurs

He had already coached for two years in the International Hockey League (IHL), he'd spent one year with Chicoutimi Sagueneens in the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League, and he'd coached high-calibre youngsters with the Toronto Marlboros Midgets. As coordinator of the U.S. Coaches Clinic, he'd developed personal contacts with NHL people.

But instead of pursuing an NHL career, he decided to change course and devote himself to the world of business.

Along with his new partner Anthony Cornacchia, Lende is the owner/operator of Lende & Cornacchia's Hockey Academy of Toronto, a high-end hockey school geared to top young talents with a future in the game. He is also the majority owner of a hockey school based in Detroit that is the flagship of his burgeoning empire.

The estimated value of his U.S. company has been set at $1 million (US), and last summer it generated a weekly profit of $33,000 (US) during the six-week summer hockey camp season, Lende said.

The scale of operations is substantially smaller in Canada, mostly because he has been living in the United States and he has been devoting his time to developing the company there.

With Cornacchia as his partner (they own 90 percent of the Canadian operation), the Canadian school is picking up business. In one week, it generates approximately $21,000 in revenue, with expenses eating up slightly less than half of that. Lende has added Roots as a Canadian corporate sponsor while in the United States, it's Jeep.

Participants get five hours a day of on-ice instruction and a one-hour lecture/analysis by Paul Dennis, video analyst and sports psychologist with the Toronto Maple Leafs. Rounding out the day is one hour of laser tag.

Lende concedes his school is not for everyone. It's geared for AA and AAA players – the elite of the minor hockey system.

"I'm strict, loud and demanding," he said. "I give parents their money back if their kids aren't interested."

The schools maintain a five to one student-teacher ratio, with a maximum of 25 skaters per class. "I have a mandate for discipline and the work ethic," an approach that can generate results in only two or three days, Lende contends.

As a youngster playing in the York Mills Hockey Association, where his late father Stephen was president, Lende played AA and AAA hockey.

At age 19, he began to coach. At first he worked with 9-year-olds, and soon he was also coaching at York Mills Collegiate, his old school. From there he went on to coach the Bantam Marlies AAA team and then the Midgets Marlies.

At 22, he opened The Hockey Academy of Toronto in Richmond Hill. In its first year of operation, 100 children attended. One of the parents of an American boy was so impressed with her son's improvement that she suggested Lende open a similar school in the United States.

Intrigued by the suggestion, he headed to Detroit and scouted rival schools. He was surprised to see that U.S. camps were not of a particularly high quality.

While his brother Dan ran the Canadian operation, Mike worked in the United States. In his first six weeks, he netted $120,000 (US).

By the next summer, he was a hot commodity on the hockey school circuit. He had spent the winter coaching with the Detroit Falcons, a Colonial League team affiliated with the IHL's Detroit Vipers. The Americans "figured a Canadian from Toronto would know what he's doing," Lende said.

Lende moved on to a role as assistant coach with the Vipers in the next winter while operating the Detroit camps in the summer. Last season, 600 kids were enrolled.

In recent months, "I had to chose between my business and coaching pro. One of them had to give," he said. "I decided the business gave me a house at 26, while in coaching, one week you're the cat's meow, the next week you're out. I also wanted to have my weekends to be a family man like my father," Lende said.

Turning down three coaching offers from American Hockey League teams, each affiliated with an NHL squad, Lende decided to devote himself to his company. He'll keep his hand in coaching, however, returning to the Midget Marlies after a six-year absence.

Unique cookbook offers a culinary history lesson

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — First, let me lay my knishes on the table. By no means am I an accomplished cook.

Sure, over the years I've been able to master the male-dominated avocation of grilling slabs of meat on propane-heated or charcoal-fired barbecues. But that's just cookery kindergarten. After all, how much skill does it take to flip a nice piece of meat before it turns to shoe leather?

The delicate art of selecting ingredients, seasoning them, mixing them carefully and modifying recipes to add a personal touch – well, that's another story entirely. It might even mean going shopping for exotic ingredients and actually knowing what you're doing.

As my mother, Clara, might say – she whose blintzes are renowned on three continents – "from cooking you don't know."

That's why even I like kitchen impresario Joan Nathan's newest Jewish cookbook, Jewish Cooking in America, Alfred A. Knopf, distributed in Canada by Random House, $49. You need not know the first thing about cooking to enjoy this volume, an updated version of Nathan's 1994 edition.

The book itself contains hundreds of recipes from the four corners of the Jewish world, featuring just about every Jewish community from Massachusetts to Marrakesh. There's also plenty of humor in the book (How can one recognize a Reform Jew in a bakery on Friday? He orders a challah and says, "slice it."), but what really sets it apart is its devotion to history.

Not just any history, mind you, but the anthropological description of Jewish food, cooking and eating establishments in the United States.

The story begins in New Amsterdam, which later became New York. In 1654, 23 Sephardi Jews fleeing the Catholic Inquisition in Recife, Brazil, arrived in the Dutch settlement. The Jewish settlers adapted their way of cooking to the New World's new ingredients while maintaining Jewish dietary laws (kashrut), Nathan tells us. They slaughtered their own animals, fried foods in vegetable oil as opposed to lard and, thanks to their cleaning and preparation techniques, developed a reputation among their neighbors for quality and cleanliness.

Successive waves of immigrants brought their cooking styles to America and by 1917 there were a million Jews eating 156 million pounds of kosher meat annually.

While meat was at the heart of a good meal for many, Nathan also includes numerous vegetarian dishes and lower-cholesterol concoctions.

Especially intriguing are the regional recipes Nathan delights in including, things like "Baton Rouge Matzah Balls," "Passover Bumuelos" (fried donuts),"Chef Allen's Rhubarb Tsimmes," "Sarina Roffe's Adjwah" (Syrian date-filled crescents), "Libyan haroset" and "Kuchen, North Carolina style."

Nathan has clearly solicited the family recipes of good cooks from all over the United States, but she's missed out on Canadian classics like "Clara Lungen's Prairie gefilte fish" or "Sharron Lungen's ultra-decadent chocolate chewy cookies," each of which generate lots of "Paul Lungen's brownie points," which are redeemable for favors all year round.

There's plenty here to sink your teeth into, particularly the historic background behind the foods we take for granted. Did you know:

• that pastrami was brought to North America by Romanian immigrants and originally was made from goose meat. With the decline in popularity of geese and the rise of the beef industry, goose was replaced with a fatty cut of brisket;

• the "Reuben sandwich" was named for Arnold Reuben, who ran a delicatessen in Manhattan and who developed the sandwich in 1918 for a famous actress;

• bagel recipes include boiling because itinerant Jewish peddlers did not have clean water to ritually wash their hands while saying a blessing, so they boiled the dough rather than bake it. That put the bagels outside the category of traditional bread and it meant they no longer had to complete the ritual handwashing before eating it;

• "matjes" herring means maiden or young, tender herring. It has come to refer to Dutch, Swedish or Icelandic herring that is cured in sugar and salt and often is pickled in a red sauce with sandalwood;

• around the turn of the century, there were almost 4,000 kosher butcher shops in New York City;

Trainer savors Skip Away's success

By HARLAN ABBEY
Special to The CJN

BUFFALO — Thousands of sports fans know Hubert "Sonny" Hine as the trainer of America's best race horse, Skip Away.

Sports

But few of them also know:
• that Hine is the grandson of a cantor and the great-grandson and great-great-grandson of rabbis;
• that Hine spent a year at Yale;
• that he served behind enemy lines in North Korea;
• that he was recruited into the FBI by J. Edgar Hoover himself;
• that he's paid hospital bills for dozens of needy race-trackers;
• and that he'll never enter a horse in a race on Yom Kippur.

For Hine, Skip Away is the "cherry on top" of a 40 year career in the horse racing business. With an eight-race winning streak and more than $9 million in earnings so far, Skip Away's production is pretty impressive for a $22,500 birthday present intended for his wife Carolyn.

"If he remains undefeated through the Breeders Cup Classic (Nov. 7 for $2 million) he'll retire as the biggest money-winning horse ever," his trainer said.

"We want him to leave a legacy. We owe it to the horse."

Until Skip Away made him a nationally recognized sports figure, Hine had carved out a distinguished career for himself with such stakes winners as Guilty Conscience, Amber Pass, Bet Big, Technology, Norquestor and Skip Trial, Skip Away's sire.

Nearly all were bought, like Skip Away, at sales of two-year-olds in training, and nearly all for modest prices.

Skip Away's value as a breeding stallion has been estimated between $4 million to $6 million. He could be bred to about 80 mares a year at a stud fee of $20,000 to $30,000 per mare.

But until that decision is made, Sonny and Carolyn Hine (are enjoying the thrills Skip Away brings them.

Hine said he prefers "to buy young horses as two-year-olds in training rather than as yearlings. At two, you can see if they can stand training, and you can see how well they move.

"After more than 40 years of experience, I can't tell you which of the sale two-year-olds will be a great horse – but I can tell you which ones won't be," he said.

"Of perhaps 200 horses at a sale, I'll only take a further look at 50 or 60."

Great horses like Skip Away are so few and far between that the Hines want to savor every minute of their time with the best race horse in America, despite the extra travel required and demands on their time.

In Skip Away's second stakes race on grass, "he came flying down the home stretch to be second," Hine said. "Then I knew I had a super horse. He won his next start by 18 lengths."

Next year, with Skip Away retired, "We'll take life a little easier," Hine predicted.

"But you know, I've never really learned how to live...just how to work."

Choosing kids hockey equipment a safety issue

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — You don't have to drop a bundle to outfit a child for hockey, according to an expert on skates and hockey equipment.

Joel Majer, 31, founder of JM Marketing Ltd., a hockey supply company based at Centennial Arena in North York, has specialized in fitting children and teenagers with new and used skates and equipment for more than 15 years.

One of the country's largest independent suppliers of hockey equipment, and an expert in sharpening and aligning skates, Majer stressed that proper fit is much more important than the quality of the equipment used.

"You grow out of hockey equipment instead of into it." Proper fit is essential for the skater's safety, protection and performance, he stressed.

In deciding the quality of the equipment, Majer said he assesses the child's needs, and often recommends used equipment for young skaters who are growing, particularly those who are not playing at a high competitive level.

The two most important pieces of equipment are the helmet and the skates, he said. A helmet should be bought new or relatively new because it only has a lifespan of seven or eight years. Helmets ($60 to $90 new, $25 to $35 used) are adjustable. Majer suggested a helmet be bought at the smallest setting so it can be adjusted as the child grows.

"A helmet has to fit snugly. The cage should lock into the chin and not be able to lift up. I usually lift the child up by the cage to see if the helmet moves."

A mouth guard ($5 to $10) can reduce concussions by an estimated 25 percent while a neck guard ($20) prevents cuts to the neck, he added.

Well-fitting skates ($100 new, $40 used) are necessary for good performance, and it is important to make sure used skates are solid at the ankles. "You hold the skate by the back and squeeze the ankle. You want the skates to be hard. Check the blade. Rust doesn't matter, but you need to have some blade. Three quarters of an inch is the minimum size."

Majer measures the front, length, width and the back of the feet before selecting a skate, and he cautioned against choosing a brand name first, because all skates fit differently. Check the fit of skates, he suggested. They "should be snug. Undo the laces. The toes should be nice and firm and make sure there's a pencil width between the heel and the skate. If you can get two fingers in, it's too big. If the skates are big, the child will be skating on an angle. More people have wider feet. The worst thing you can do is go for a bigger skate to compensate for a wide foot."

Majer recommended keeping the same brand of skates if they're comfortable. "We're very careful about switching brands. We always check if the kid can walk straight. Then it's the right fit. New skates are not always comfortable. You need to know how to break in a skate."

An accessory kit which includes jock strap, garter belt, suspenders and velcro straps for shin pads will run about $21. He said shin pads ($10 to $40 new, $10 used) should fit with the cup over the centre of the knee, and the bottom one-quarter inch above the ankle bone. "Make sure there's not too much of a gap between the shin pad and skate," he said.

Majer said the hockey pant (new $30 to $100, used start at $15) should go to the middle of the knee with the waist band high enough to protect the kidneys; shoulder pads (new $20 to $100, used $10) should be tried with the pants, and there should be very little space between the waist band of the pants and the bottom of the shoulder pads.

Majer recommended new elbow pads ($15 to $20) because the "velcro stretches and can slip and move around, and that's useless." The shoulder pad should reach the top of the elbow pad, and the bottom of the elbow pad should reach the top of the gloves. Hockey gloves ($30 new, $15 used) should not slip off. They have to be comfortable. The more flexible the glove, the easier it is for the child to shoot."

Kids should use new hockey sticks ($15) but they should not use an adult stick that has been cut down. "It won't have the right balance," Majer said. "A beginner needs a flexible stick with a nice, thin shaft and solid blade."

The stick should reach the top of the nose if the child is out of skates and the bottom of the chin when wearing skates.

As for equipment care, Majer suggested drying the skates with a rag, and air drying all equipment, especially skates, after a game. Skate blades should be sharpened by a professional after every four to six hours of ice time.

Majer suggested washing all the hockey equipment in cold water with detergent – he recommends an industrial washer – several times a year, to prevent the growth of bacteria.

The Inside Back

Breisheet: the Series

By JORDAN MAX

I hear that Hollywood has discovered spirituality as this year's latest fad. Can television be far behind? Here are some episodes for the Breisheet (Genesis) dramatic presentation series I'll soon be pitching to the networks, complete with possible commercial sponsor angles.

Last Laugh

Snake Eyes: the Adam and Eve Story – The story of adamant nudists who, after being talked into trying a new food product by a fast-talking tree-to-tree salesman, eat without thinking or even checking for a hechsher. They subsequently discover haute couture, and are banished from the Garden of Yiddin for the fashion crime of wearing spring colors when it is clearly more appropriate that they wear autumn colors. Suggest fashion or kashrut sponsors.

Noach and the Big Mabul – Not only is Noach the only righteous person in his generation, he's also the only one who regularly watches the weather channel. He can't interest anyone in joining him for an unlimited world cruise without ports-of-call, sundeck or gambling facilities, and with lousy weather to boot. The Big Mabul is a world-wide phenomenon started by El Nino, that badly behaved kid who sat in the last row at school. Og of Bashan finds the waves great for surfing. Suggest weather oriented/sports utility vehicle sponsors.

Castle Improvements: The Tower of Bavel – It starts out simply as a house addition, but is designed by committee, isn't tendered, doesn't meet local building codes, has too many subcontractors, and goes way over budget. In the end, the owner is just left with a pile of bricks and huge bills. Faced with a pending lawsuit for negligence, the subcontractors suddenly acquire different languages and take off to the four corners of the earth. Suggest do-it-yourself hardware sponsors.

The Akedah, the Ties that Bind – (Binding of Yitzhak) – Avraham knows the interview question for the CEO position, "Would you kill your son in order to get this job?," is a trick one.

He knows all along that God is going to blink at the last minute, and just goes along with the plan in order to stay on the recruitment short list. Suggest career development sponsors.

Switched after Birth: the Yaacov/Esau story – In this high drama episode, the long-standing broigas over the birthright results in a more fundamental disagreement over the future strategic directions of Abraham Inc., the family business. Esau wants to take the company in the field of resource exploration, entertainment and global investing, while Yaacov prefers to focus on academic research. Suggest management consulting sponsors.

Veil of Secrecy: the Leah/Rachel story – The original reason for shidduch insurance. Leah and Rachel both want to marry Yaacov, and flip a coin to decide. Amid all the wedding preparations, with the caterers, the flowers, the bridal gown, etc., they just forget to tell Yaacov about the change in plans prior to the chuppah. Loads of laughs in this comedy of mistaken identity. Suggest bridal/personal identity products sponsors.

World's Biggest Mistakes: The Shechem Bris-o-Rama – Portrays an attempt by Yaacov's sons, Shimon and Levi, to enter the Genesis Book of World Records for the largest mass brit milah.

Unfortunately, they forget to consult with their lawyers about getting written medical consent and securing appropriate malpractice insurance, leading to a whole mess o'trouble and a speedy departure for the whole mishpachah to a different jurisdiction. Suggest legal sponsors.

Yehuda and Tamar's Excellent Adventure – Yehuda's a bit lonely for intellectual conversation, and seeks out a local escort service for a discrete relationship. Tamar, a young biblical escort-in-training, is seeking a permanent job in the Yovel Office. The only problem is that he gives her a special gift as payment, however, by then she has vanished. Convinced by friends and lawyers, she decides to demand larger payments for his acknowledging the relationship. Yehuda, finally caught by the evidence, is left with no choice but to publicly admit the truth. Look for spinoff series and a possible Impeachment episode. Suggest dry cleaning/legal sponsors.

Yoseph: From Shmattes to Gold – Yoseph is not actually sold by his brothers, rather he runs away to join what he thinks is a circus caravan, which he eventually leaves in order to go to the University of Cairo Law School. He later sues the caravan owners for $30 million in damages, settles out of court for an undisclosed amount, profits heavily from investing in grain futures, and retires early in a nice condominium with its own golf course in Goshen, the Borsht Belt of Egypt. Suggest insurance/investment sponsors.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I am going to a Hebrew school where I have many friends. Most of my friends come from families that are well off. I was accepted to this school even though my parents don't have a lot of money. The problem is that I don't have the latest and greatest clothes and I can't always afford to go to a lot of movies. I also have trouble buying nice gifts like my friends do. It might be my imagination, but I think they are starting to ignore me and not invite me out anymore. I'm feeling very hurt. Do you think I should say something to them?

Unsure in Montreal

Dear Unsure in Montreal,

In today's society, people should not look down on others because of their lack of money. You should not feel inferior to your friends, as superficial differences should not interfere with true friendship. There are more important things in life that determine the differences between people, and money is not one of them. Please do not feel that physical appearances and material possessions determine your popularity.

When something really worries a person, they imagine that it seems worse than it actually is. Give your friends a chance and try to think positively. There are many ways that you and your friends can hang out together and still not spend a lot of money. Try to tell your friends about cheap and fun activities that you can do instead of going out for dinner or going to the movies. There are lots of great movies to rent. There are tons of great things to do around the city and we are sure that with some more brainstorming you can come up with some really fun ideas.

If your friends do not follow your suggestions, then try to budget your money. As far as clothing goes, there are many ways to save. Instead of buying clothing at the mall, try going to the various outlets and warehouse stores, where the clothing is half the price of the same clothes sold in the mall. Try shopping at used clothing stores, as there are so many cool things to be found there. Most clothing at used stores is about one-third of the cost of regular mall clothing. Have faith in yourself, and regardless of how much money you carry around in your wallet, you will always have friends and people who care for you.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto

STRENGTHENING JEWISH IDENTITY

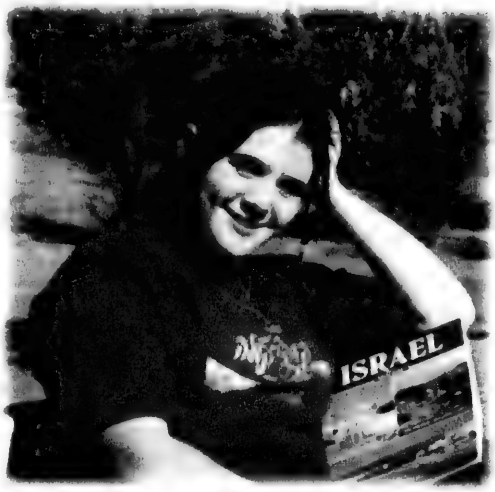
Ask Jaqlin Walters.

THIS IS THE STORY OF ONE TEENAGER WHOSE LIFE IS OFF TO A FRESH START BECAUSE OF UJA FEDERATION.

A kind comment. A gentle touch. An unexpected experience. The little things that change Jewish lives forever. For 16 year old Jaqlin Walters, who went through the motions of Jewish education and religious services, but felt little, it was a gift from her grandparents. An Israel experience, subsidized by UJA Federation. It gave Jaqlin an entirely new perspective. "Visiting the Western Wall really got to me. I just started crying. It's been there for 3,000 years and represents all the people who fought for it. It symbolizes the obstacles that Israel has overcome and where we are today as a Jewish people," she explains. With a deeper understanding of the Holocaust, thanks to a three day seminar at Yad Vashem, Jaqlin hopes to participate in the next March of the Living before attending Hebrew University. Today, because of her visit to Israel, Jaqlin's Jewish vision includes a past present and future. "I feel more Jewish now, like



I'm not the only one," she says. "I feel like I'm part of the circle."

UJA Federation's community Campaign for Fifty will allocate $6.5 million in new funds to help Jews like Jaqlin strengthen their identities. These additional dollars will support, among other projects, family education programs, more day school subsidies for families in need, enhanced supplementary schools and greater participation by Toronto teenagers in the March of the Living.

Talks go into overtime

Negotiations continue despite terror attack

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WYE MILLS, Maryland — Talks between Israel and the Palestinan Authority were extended amidst reports Monday from Israel of a terrorist attack on a bus in Beersheba.

More than 50 people were reported injured after two hand grenades were thrown at the bus. As of this writing, one suspect was arrested.

Despite the attack, the parties continued their efforts in Maryland to try to find common ground. On Sunday night, the United States put forward a "bridging proposal" seeking to resolve the wide gaps between the sides on outstanding security issues.

At one point in the proceedings, the parties even halted direct bilateral talks. The halt in the bilateral meetings appeared to be a result of the apparent inability of either side to move from their opening positions since arriving at Wye.

"It doesn't seem as if we are any closer to an agreement now than we were yesterday," said an Israeli source on Sunday. "The mood is glum because the Palestinians have not budged," said another source.

"We are back at square one, except for security, because there are no new suggestions from Israel," countered a Palestinian source. Senior Israeli delegates said that on certain security issues the gaps had even widened.

U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright put forward a paper on security issues over the weekend for the parties to consider.

The Palestinians put forward principles on fighting terrorism that were worked out during talks with CIA director George Tenet earlier this month.

The Israelis have called these points "good" but insist they are still "insufficient, because they have not translated this into an operational 12-week working plan."

One difference remaining on security is the Palestinian insistence on symmetry between disarming Hamas militants and radical elements among the settlers.

The United States is unsure if Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Prime Minister Yasser Arafat have the political will to conclude a peace agreement at the Wye summit, State Department Spokesman James Rubin said yesterday.

Rubin repeatedly refused to say explicitly if U.S. mediators felt they had made progress in the intensive negotiations, that began last Thursday.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon joined the talks on Sunday. Industry and Trade Minister Natan

Unseasonably dry weather and heavy winds also contributed to the fires, some of which were caused by Sukkot picnickers who left coals burning.

Hebron Curfew Lifted

HEBRON — The Israeli army ended a curfew on Palestinians in the Israeli-controlled section of Hebron. The decision to end the curfew, which had been prompted by a Sept. 30 grenade attack that wounded 14 Israeli soldiers and 11 Palestinians, came one day after the easing of a 10-day closure on the West Bank and Gaza.

WORLD

Party To Expel Lawmaker

MOSCOW — Russian prosecutors are considering criminal charges against Gen. Albert Makashov, a Communist lawmaker who recently uttered several anti-Semitic comments. And leaders of the Russian Communist party promised to expel Makashov, who earlier this month said, "It is time to expel all Yids out of Russia." At recent mass rallies, Makashov said Jews are to blame for Russia's economic crisis, and that President Boris Yeltsin should be "turned to soap."

Rabbi Beaten

MOSCOW — Two unidentified men attacked a Lubavitch rabbi in the central Russian city of Nizhniy Novgorod last week. Rabbi Zalman Yoffe, 31, was attacked near his home in the city, about 400 kilometres east of Moscow. He suffered serious head injuries. His condition was described as stable.

Clinton Opens Records

WASHINGTON — Additional U.S. records on Nazi war criminals will see the light of day. On Oct. 8, President Bill Clinton signed the Nazi War Crimes Disclosure Act, which was passed by Congress in August. The new law calls for the creation of the Nazi War Criminal Records Interagency Working Group, which will make formerly classified records concerning the Holocaust available to the public.

Doctor Praises Mengele

LOS ANGELES — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has called on the German state government of Bavaria to condemn and detain an admitted concentration camp doctor. Hans Muench, 87, in a recent interview with the weekly magazine Der Spiegel, boasted of his experiments on Jewish inmates at Auschwitz, spoke of Jews as subhumans and praised the infamous Nazi doctor Joseph Mengele for his "intelligence and convictions."

Bonds To Honor Cotler

NEW YORK — Prof. Irwin Cotler of McGill University of Montreal will be among 23 former leaders of the Soviet Jewry movement to be honored by Israel Bonds at a dinner here Oct. 25. Former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev and former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir are slated to attend. Toronto's Wendy Eisen is also an honoree.

A Shnapps and Pickle For Gore

WASHINGTON — Vice-President Al Gore stood in front of a Conservative congregation with a shot glass filled with vodka in his left hand, and a pickle and a piece of pumpernickel bread in his right.

"Rabbi, teach me how to do this," he implored Rabbi Leonid Feldman.

Gore joined about 150 congregants of Temple Emanuel in Palm Beach, Fla., in their Simchat Torah service before attending a Democratic party fundraising event that raised some $500,000.

"What a way to start a day," joked Gore. "A shot of vodka taken in a synagogue."

The Soviet-born Rabbi Feldman introduced the vodka tradition into the shul's Simchat Torah and Purim celebrations 10 years ago.

"Mr. Vice-President, you have met many rabbis, but I am sure they didn't feel the way I do today," said Rabbi Feldman, who was imprisoned in the former Soviet Union for his Jewish activities.

Jewish homelessness: A tale of two women

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — This is the story of two Jewish women. One used to be a social worker, who never lost her professional instincts. The other, until recently, spent a year as one of roughly 4,700 homeless in Toronto, sleeping in bus shelters, fending off physical attacks, and eating what and when she could.

The year on Toronto's streets took its toll on Rachel (not her real name). She is about 50, and frightfully thin. Her lower legs, although better now, are caked in pink and gray sores, a condition that is said to be common among the homeless. Under a donated winter coat, which she clutches to herself, she wears a tattered skirt and skimpy top. Her sneakers have holes in them.

But a few weeks ago, her luck changed. She met Lillian Freedman, who found her a one-room apartment in downtown Toronto. And as a result of Freedman's vocal efforts since then, Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) has inaugurated a two-month pilot project to find Jewish homeless in the city.

The development comes on the heels of front-page media reports on the homeless, now that winter is around the corner.

Earlier this month, a coalition of social activists, academics and business people termed the plight of Toronto's homeless "a national disaster," and called for emergency action.

"If there are homeless Jews out there, we need to be aware and we need to respond to them," says JF&CS executive director Gordon Wolfe. "I don't believe there are a lot of Jewish homeless, but even one is too many."

Lillian Freedman

Simon Kalkstein, a social worker at the downtown branch of JF&CS, estimates there are fewer than a dozen Jewish homeless in the city's core, and some suffer from mental illness. That would be in keeping with a recent study that showed 66 percent of homeless have been diagnosed with a mental illness at some point in their lives.

Freedman has the agency's backing and authority – and a small supply of cash – to find Jewish homeless and put them up at an inexpensive hotel for up to three nights until JF&CS can deal with them on a more lasting basis.

JF&CS has also struck a committee to deal with Jewish homeless, once more are found.

One morning in late August, Freedman happened to be at the corner of College and Elizabeth streets in downtown Toronto, and she noticed a frail figure sleeping in a streetcar shelter. The old social work skills kicked in.

"She looked fragile and tired," Freedman recalls. "And she was close to my age. I thought, 'Why is a woman my age sleeping in a streetcar shelter?'

"I went over to talk to her. I gave her some money for breakfast. She was very polite. And I know this sounds funny, but she looked and sounded Jewish. I asked if she was. And she is."

Rachel was raised in a Jewish home in Toronto. She remembers learning some Hebrew. She's a graduate of a well-known high school and attended the University of Toronto. She has siblings, from whom she is estranged.

Although quite lucid, she's nervous – still terrified by her ordeal, which included sleeping in dangerous flop houses, being robbed and enduring last winter mainly outdoors. Her eyes dart about when she is asked questions, but she displays a quick wit, followed by an open, genuine smile.

Her rent is $426 a month, and now that she has an address, her welfare will go up to $520 monthly. JF&CS has paid the first and last month's rent on her modest apartment, and through its financial assistance program, will top up the welfare.

But Rachel can't help being suspicious of her benefactor's generosity. She has yet to unpack her belongings, all contained in one shopping bag. She simply can't help but feel that this too is temporary; that it will be snatched away, or stolen from her.

"Yeah," she chuckles. "You can get the girl out of the streets, but you can't get the streets out of the girl. For me, survival is an ordeal."

God gave them courage

Like studying an ocean in midstream, its horizon beyond comprehension, we stand in the flow of Jewish history looking back on the Day of Atonement 25 years ago that was unlike any other before or since.

An entire generation has been born into the Jewish world, into the world at large since Yom Kippur 25 years ago and the surprise attack launched against Israel by Syria and Egypt.

That generation has no memory of the fact that Israel's sheer physical survival hung in a precarious balance during the first few days of the war.

It has no memory of Israel's betrayal at the hands of the European democracies. At Israel's most desperate hour, only Portugal permitted the United States to fly through its air space to facilitate the re-supply of weaponry to the beleaguered Jewish state battling for its very life.

That generation has no memory of the moratorium imposed by Great Britain on the delivery to Israel of arms and weapons that Israel had purchased prior to the war.

Nor does it recall that Israel was placed in virtual isolation in the international community as a result of the sanctimonious and unctuous pandering to the suppliers of oil. Most African countries severed diplomatic relations with Israel.

The Soviet and Arab blocs of nations turned the UN into a topsy-turvy, morally inverted world of lies and hypocrisy.

That generation has no memory of the oil embargo imposed against industrialized nations by the Arab oil-producing states. Western, liberal, democracies were tested by the blatant oil blackmail.

They failed that test totally.

Principle, ethics, humanity, fairness and decency surrendered to economic self-interest.

But we, the older generation, are indeed old enough to remember. And we, the older generation, are old enough to recall with unforgettable clarity the eerie, unsettling sight of men wearing tallitot, scurrying back and forth from prayers in shul on Yom Kippur, sitting in their cars listening for news on the radio.

In Jerusalem, the atmosphere was surrealistic. The peace of the usually silent day was broken in the early morning by jets flying overhead. Then, at 2 p.m., the air raid siren wailed across the city and across the country.

Abraham Rabinovich described the way the people of Jerusalem received the news of the outbreak of war:

"In the crowded Sephardi Synagogue in Jerusalem's Ramat Eshkol, a young man rose from his seat when his name was shouted from the doorway by an army courier. But his father, who was sitting next to him, held him in an embrace and refused to let him go. The synagogue's rabbi told the weeping father that his son could not stay. 'His place is not here today,' said the rabbi. The father released his son and the rabbi placed his hand on the young man's head to bless him.

"Throughout Jerusalem, men wearing prayer shawls and skullcaps could be seen driving cars or thumbing lifts to mobilization points sometimes with knapsacks over their shoulders. Some had time to stop by their homes to break their fast which began at sundown Friday.

"In a synagogue in Bayit Vegan, a rabbi interrupted services in the afternoon to tell all men in the congregation that it was permissible to break their fast if they were called up and to use motor vehicles to reach their gathering points.

"In Beit Hakerem, a synagogue sexton called for silence in order to read out a list of names handed him by a courier. One of the names was that of his own son.

"'A war has begun,' said a rabbi in Katamon. 'Let us pray for our soldiers, may God give them courage and protect them.'"

In the photo inserted in this column, the distraught, grieving mother clutches the gravestone that marks her son's place of burial. The father, numb, distracted, clutches his wife.

With deep humility, almost trepidation, lest I unintentionally diminish the sense of the parents' suffering or abate the outpouring of empathy for their pain, it is appropriate, somehow, to point out that irony.

Chaim Yichyeh fell on the field of battle so that…life will live.

So did more than 2,000 other sons and soldiers of Israel in the war that was started on Yom Kippur 25 years ago.

Twenty-five years ago, the enemy was repulsed. The tide of terrifying battle eventually turned. Once again, in the flow of Jewish history, Israel vanquished its enemies. But the sorrow of the families, of the nation and of the people was great. Every generation will always remember that.

Plans for new CHAT building put on hold

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The new building for the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) may not be located on the grounds of the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) after all.

Enrolment at CHAT is higher than anticipated, so the high school's plans to build are on hold, BJC executive director Deborah Pinsky recently told the centre's annual meeting.

The new CHAT building had won a rezoning bid for the BJC site, but the area is now too small to accommodate the school's needs, Pinsky said.

One location under consideration was a parking lot to the south of the swimming pool.

Alternative sites are being looked at by the three partners, CHAT, UJA Federation and BJC, she said, but no decision has been made.

CHAT is presently located in a former public school on Wilmington Avenue in what Pinsky described as an "inadequate site."

In other agenda items, the meeting heard good news from incoming president Tom Lobel: "The time of uncontrollable deficits is over and we have moved to small but real surpluses."

He was referring to the financial crises the former Jewish Community Centre encountered beginning in 1994 when it faced possible bankruptcy.

In the year just ended, the BJC made a profit of $1,900, with overall revenues increasing by two percent, treasurer Bruce Leboff reported.

Total membership in the BJC has reached 8,000 according to the meeting's chair, Helen Finder Guttman.

Program income of $2.1 million was up over 10 percent from the prior year and rental income was up more than four percent, while the cost of administration was reduced by $74,000, the treasurer said.

The BJC programs are available to all, regardless of financial means, Leboff said, and this year the BJC granted scholarships and subsidies of more than $212,000.

To finance this, the BJC depends in part on donations, but these declined by 17 percent, or $50,000.

"We remain the pre-eminent agency in our community," said outgoing president Michael Kerbel.

"We've returned to our former status and our financial integrity is maintained."

New partnerships with Mount Sinai Hospital and Baycrest Hospital, as well as the new Children's Discovery Museum, the new teenage lounge and a much upgraded energy room for all members, were listed as highlights of the year by Kerbel.

He thanked Marty Goldberg, Pinsky and Lobel "for sustaining us during our period of turmoil."

For the first time since its financial trouble, United Way has guaranteed two years of funding for the BJC, Pinsky said.

She announced that the Children's Discovery Museum, "a family affair," will open officially on Oct. 18.

Volunteer plaques, T-shirts and sweatshirts were given to Sid Cohen and Norman Mogil by executive committee member Bernie Fishbein.

Spielberg project comes to end

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After four years, Steven Spielberg's Holocaust documentary project has officially ended in Canada, having videotaped the testimonies of 2,800 survivors across the country.

Canadian operations ended Sept. 30, but anyone still wishing to be taped may arrange a session through the project's Los Angeles headquarters.

The focus of the project is now shifting toward cataloguing and disseminating the information contained in the testimonies.

Last week, Michael Berenbaum, president and CEO of Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation, was in town to drum up support for the project's second phase.

The foundation has embarked on a $50-million (US) fundraising campaign to allow it to develop new technologies, including computer software, interactive CD-ROMs, films and videos.

Berenbaum joined Ontario culture minister Isabel Bassett and several Holocaust educators and survivors at a Queen's Park reception to discuss new ways in which the testimonies will be made available to researchers.

Bassett visited the foundation's Los Angeles headquarters in August.

Worldwide, the project has taped 48,260 survivors' testimonies in 31 languages and 57 countries, Berenbaum noted. The goal of 50,000 will be reached in December, he added, and international operations will wrap up after that.

"We have amassed 110,000 hours of material. To view that, if you watched 24 hours a day, seven days a week, you would get up in the spring of 2010."

Originally, the project's goal was to share the testimonies with the world's leading repositories of Holocaust research, including Yad Vashem.

Now, the task at hand is to use technology to disseminate the data as widely as possible to schools, museums, libraries, universities and research centres, Berenbaum said.

A Toronto branch of the project opened in 1994, and most of the Canadian testimonies were taped here. Across the country, 500 were done in Montreal; 100 in Winnipeg; 50 in Vancouver; 50 in Ottawa; 25 in London; 20 in Calgary; 10 in Edmonton; 10 in Windsor; and six in eastern Canada.

In Los Angeles, the project is digitizing and cataloguing the material. Berenbaum said future researchers will be able to access specific portions of testimonies using searches by key words.

Berenbaum said the project's task is to make the Holocaust "no longer abstract" to young people.

"Simply by testifying, they have remembered," he said of survivors. "And by making this material public, we will not let the world forget."

Rachel spent holidays wandering the streets in centre for homeless women. But that was temporary, as are so many avenues for the homeless.

"A lot of help is passive," Freedman observes. "It's short term or just a Band-Aid. Even the Out of the Cold Program [in which houses of worship take in the homeless for a night] is only a little better than nothing."

When Rachel left the drop-in centre, Freedman returned her to "her" streetcar shelter, where she spent the High Holy Days wandering the streets and barely scraping by on the $195 in monthly welfare some homeless are qualified to receive.

"In the back of my mind, I knew this wasn't right," says Freedman, who brought Rachel food parcels and took her to a psychiatric facility. She was turned away because she wasn't an emergency psychiatric case.

"My last call was to JF&CS," says Freedman, who worked at the agency in the early 1960s. "At first, they told me they don't do housing. I told them I would do this with or without them. I think I embarrassed them into doing something."

Through her own initiative, and with the assistance provided by JF&CS, Freedman found Rachel a place to live.

Asked what motivated a retired social worker to return to the fray, Freedman doesn't miss a beat. "My grandfather was a chassidic rabbi. I was brought up in a family where Jewish values were important. It's a shandeh not to help the most vulnerable in our society."

She sighs. "Frankly, I don't think our grandparents wanted us to become chazzers. I don't know what we're becoming."

In the meantime, Rachel is struggling to find that equilibrium the rest of us call normalcy. She has to re-learn how to live indoors, how to shop, how to cook. She no longer has to sleep clutching her purse, which was stolen months ago, along with all vestiges of her former self.

She won't say how she became homeless. "I'm in pain," she states matter-of-factly. "I'm in constant mental and physical pain."

Participating synagogues in Out of the Cold

Again this winter, several Metro-area synagogues will be taking part in the Out of the Cold program, in which the homeless receive a hot meal and a place to sleep for the night.

Holy Blossom Temple will be the host every Thursday evening beginning Nov. 5.

Congregation Darchei Noam will again team with St. Peter's Roman Catholic church at Bathurst and Bloor to welcome homeless at the church. The synagogue will supply 70 volunteers.

Those homeless who would normally go to St. Peter's on Christmas Eve and New Year's Eve this year will be welcomed instead at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

The First Narayever synagogue on Brunswick Avenue has joined a coalition of area churches to support the program on Tuesday nights at Trinity St. Paul's Church at Bloor and Spadina. As well, a quarter of all High Holy Day appeals at the synagogue will go toward supporting the program.

And Temple Har Zion in Thornhill is planning to team up with volunteers from Temple Kol Ami and members of a neighboring Zoroastrian temple to welcome the homeless. The Jaffari Islamic Centre next door to Har Zion will be contributing financially to the interfaith effort. – R.C.

More summit hopes

These words are being written while the leaders of Israel, the Palestinian Authority (PA) and the United States are still meeting at Wye Plantation in Maryland. What little news has been reported has not been positive, except that the talks were extended by at least one day. To date, the two sides have not been able to agree on any substantive issues. For Israel, the key issue is security; for the PA, it is land.

If the summit cannot produce even minor positive results, it will be very difficult to instil any hope for the peace process. And if it comes to a situation "on the ground" devoid of hope for a peace agreement, the danger of renewed and reinvigorated violence will increase. The forces seeking peace will face a strengthened enemy in the extremist forces unalterably opposed to any peace. Even as these words are being written, the news wire services have reported a terrorist attack in Beersheba that injured more than 50 people.

The majority of Israel wants the peace process to move forward. Last Friday, a Gallup poll conducted for the daily Ma'ariv indicated that 82 percent of Israelis want an agreement to result from the summit meeting; 13 percent do not want one, and five percent do not know if they do or not. Fifty-seven percent of the people polled would even support an IDF redeployment from 13 percent of the territories; 30 percent would not support such a redeployment, while 13 percent did not have an opinion.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is fully aware of the public's opinion back home. He has already agreed in principle to the next troop withdrawal from the territories. But as of this moment, he is still waiting for the PA to agree to keep their promises on security.

25 years ago, today

Last week, in Israel, the festivities marking the 50th year of the state's existence came officially to an end. To commemorate the anniversary, people all over the world, Jews and non-Jews, celebrated many joyous and tearful celebrations.

But one-half of its lifetime ago, the existence of this tiny remarkable state hung in an uncertain balance of courage, resolve and sacrifice. On Yom Kippur 1973, a Saturday that year, the armies of Syria and Egypt attacked. For the fourth time in 25 years, the nation was at war against neighbors who were trying, again, to destroy it.

Twenty-five years ago today, on Oct. 22, the war ended. The United Nations Security Council passed Resolution 338 calling upon the warring parties to cease firing. Although there was still some sporadic shooting in the ensuing days, the war was essentially over. Israel absorbed the first devastating blows and beat back the Arab forces.

The number of people who lost their lives during those horrible two and half weeks was enormous: 2,522 Israelis and an estimated 15,000 Egyptians and 3,500 Syrians.

The late Chaim Herzog, former president of Israel, wrote The War of Atonement, the definitive text on the Yom Kippur War. In the foreword to the book he observed the following: "The inherent strength and resilience of the people of Israel was revealed in the stark, grim and tragic days at the outset of the war, when, fighting back against overwhelming odds, they overcame the initial setbacks and achieved military success. I came away from this work imbued with a sense of deep humility…No people in the world crave for peace more than the people of Israel, and yet none are more ready for self-sacrifice should the necessity arise."

Twenty-five years ago, during the silent introspection of atonement and the quiet travail of fasting, that necessity arose again.Thus as we turn the page in the chronicle of the year-long festivities of Israel at 50, let us linger a moment, acknowledging gratefully the "entry" dedicated to the lives that bore Israel the future we celebrated this year.

Anti-Semitism and homophobia not problems at IRB

A number of recent articles in your newspaper, as well as in the mainstream media, have created an impression that anti-Semitism and homophobia are running rampant at the Immigration and Refugee Board. While there may well have been some Refugee Board members who have made intemperate remarks, these are isolated incidents and not reflective of an institutional problem.

In fact, any visitor to the Refugee Board will observe a work place that features a rainbow of visible minorities of many races and religions, from the most junior clerk to the chair herself. The problems plaguing the Refugee Board at the systemic level are hot anti-Semitism or homophobia but rather, competence or lack thereof. Refugee Board members in the vast majority of cases have no principled way of determining whether the refugee appearing before them is being truthful in narrating their history. The energy of the Refugee Board should be focused upon tackling this problem rather than being diverted by well intentioned individuals who seek to find a systemic problem where none exists.

Sheila Finestone scores Bouchard on retail signs

The issue surrounding bilingual signage at department stores is not about pressure, intimidation or boycotts, as the provincial government has suggested. The issue is about the exercise of democratic rights, as well as social peace and respect for minority rights.

By asserting that bilingual signage at retail stores will disturb the "linguistic peace" in Quebec, the provincial government is attempting to burn the bridges of understanding arrived at through political compromise and legislated rights. I applaud the Retail Council of Quebec for its decision to uphold the legal rights to which it is entitled.

Contrary to the view portrayed by the provincial government in an attempt to create a crisis, the francophone and anglophone communities in Montreal live and work side by side in harmony. Both communities should feel at home and comfortable everywhere in Canada. This means that a welcoming environment should be fostered throughout Canada.

The people of Quebec are worried about health care, education and taxes. Premier Bouchard would be well advised to focus on these issues rather fostering fear and social unrest.

Hold off on praise for Mandela

What a refreshing change to read a factual report on the Mandela/Israel relationship. Instead of the adulatory, fawning reportage about this "hero," we get a glimpse of real attitudes. I did not go to the love-in at the Dome. I did not attend any celebratory gatherings. I merely applied the only yardstick that matters in a situation like this.

How does he relate to Israel? We know about his meetings with various Arab groups. We have heard his opinions and advice on Palestinian aspirations. And we praise the dismantling of apartheid. But, let's not get carried away with blind enthusiasm. Mandela has not visited Israel. He does not approve of the prime minister there. He does get along with Syria, Libya, Iraq, and supports the PLO. Whenever he gets around to supporting and encouraging the further development of the Jewish state will be the appropriate time for recognizing his statesmanship.

Questions Israel's record on South Africa

Re Sheldon Kirshner's article (CJN, Oct. 1), "Mandela's refusal to visit Israel due to policy shift."

I would like to question his statement that "Mandela's refusal to visit Israel is due to policy shift," and that "Israel regularly condemned apartheid."

While much of the world imposed sanctions on the South African apartheid regime, Israel was actively involved in selling arms and providing uniforms to the regime's military. That doesn't strike me as the best approach to condemnation.

Approves Mandela's decision on Israel

Sheldon Kirshner's analysis of Israel-South Africa relations (CJN, Oct. 1) is imbalanced. Kirshner summarizes his article by observing that "blips" in Israel's relations with "the old" [apartheid] South Africa rarely occurred. Do I detect in that statement a modicum of tolerance for the white-supremacist government that oppressed South Africa's non-white majority? Jews can be proud that South Africa's large and outspoken Jewish community made some great contributions to the fight against apartheid.

Kirshner mentions that Israel regularly condemned apartheid. But Israel was a strong ally of the apartheid regime, supplying weapons, equipment and training to the South African Defence Force.

In light of these facts I find it understandable that Nelson Mandela would refuse to visit Israel, his distaste for the current Likud government aside. Israel should be far more discriminating when choosing clients for its weapons industry.

The War of Atonement: A Pictorial Essay

Photographs can stir emotions and evoke memories. In this small pictorial essay, we have assembled merely slivers of glimpses into a tiny sampling of the awful, straining and terribly human moments of the Yom Kippur War. Clockwise from the right: soldiers in the Sinai building a makeshift sukkah atop their vehicle; chaplains trying to lend comfort to a grieving father mourning his son's death; a blind-folded Syrian pilot in Israeli captivity; Israeli forces moving westward across the Suez Canal into Egypt; Gen. Abdel Gamasy (in the light colored suit), head of the Egyptian disengagement team, walks past Israeli soldiers and leaves the negotiations at the infamous Kilometer 101 along the Cairo-Suez road; Chief of Staff David Elazar (right) and former chief of staff Yitzhak Rabin (in civilian clothing) tour the battle scene on the Golan Heights. Jerusalem's pedal pushers

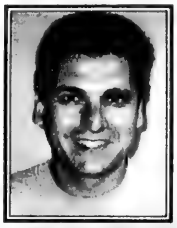
There are few minorities in Jerusalem smaller than the one I joined several weeks ago. To be an adult cyclist in Jerusalem is to know what it is to stand out alone in a crowd.



By Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

For the few brave souls who regularly take to the city's streets on two wheels, using their bicycles as a means of transportation, it's an urban jungle out there. I've come to appreciate the plight of Jerusalem's pedal pushers, ever since I became one myself last month. It was not a casual decision, knowing in advance what I would be up against.

Few major cities in the world are less hospitable to cyclists than the Israeli capital. To begin with, the city's topography hardly lends itself to bike travel. Built on a series of hills, Jerusalem is anything but a casual ride. Without good lungs, strong legs and a decent bike, forget it.

It's virtually impossible to peddle for more than five minutes in any direction without hitting some daunting uphill slope.

That's the easy part. Far more treacherous are the city's heavily congested arteries on which bike riders must negotiate countless potholes, sunken sewer gratings and a minefield of broken glass. If only that were the worst of it.

The real enemy is the one you can't fight or even barely defend yourself against. Cyclists in Jerusalem are known to say their prayers before mounting their bikes, aware they'll be facing some of the planet's most inconsiderate, undisciplined and otherwise psychopathic drivers.

Admittedly, even between the best drivers and cyclists, there's little compatibility. That's why God created bike paths and special bike lanes.

Everywhere except in the Holy City. Unlike most major capitals in the world, Jerusalem has done nothing to facilitate cycling within its boundaries. No bike routes, no bike parking facilities, no special events for cyclists. Nothing. Small wonder cyclists are such a rare sight in the capital.

Given Jerusalem's acute traffic and parking problems, the municipality should welcome any alternative to cars and buses. Especially if it's relatively inexpensive and environmentally friendly. Instead, city hall shows as much concern about encouraging cyclists as it does about building an ice rink for deprived immigrant hockey players.

But for all this adversity, once a year for 26 hours, Jerusalem turns into a cyclist's paradise. It happens quite by default, with no thanks to city hall.

Picture it, if you can, a metropolis devoid of cars. Without the incessant rumble of motors and horns. Without the relentless fumes and exhaust.

Without the mass of moving metal and chrome. In short, imagine the antithesis of modern urban life – and one of my fantasies come true.

Such ideal conditions for bike riders come about only because of Yom Kippur. In an uncharacteristic display of unity, all of (west) Jerusalem's residents – religious and secular – respect a time-honored tradition, dating back well before the state was established, according to which nobody drives their cars on Yom Kippur. The resulting tranquility is at once soothing and almost eerie – and perfect for cycling.

At around 5 p.m., with the sun nearly set and Yom Kippur officially kicking in, kids on bikes take over the city's streets, reveling in their sudden freedom from the menace of motorists.

This year, I promised my kids that for the first time I would join them in their city cycle safari on Yom Kippur. That meant I would have to buy a bike, something I would do only if I was confident I would also use it after the holiday was over.

In my previous life, I was an avid city cyclist. Since moving to Israel eight years ago, I often toyed with the idea of getting a bike but never followed through. Now, with my kids as a catalyst, I decided to take the plunge.

Finally, a few weeks ago on a warm evening, I joined my three children for our first-ever major excursion together on bikes. We rode for hours through several neighborhoods, unimpeded by automobile traffic. It was magnificent.

The next day, after exploring more of the city by bike, we felt an impending sense of doom as the sun began to set. We knew our bicycle bliss was about to expire. Soon, it would be another year before we would be able to savor such freedom in the city.

Since then, under far less favorable conditions, I have been cautiously riding to work every day, attracting strange looks of pity from people baffled by the sight of an adult riding a bike through Jerusalem.

Israel's prolonged leadership drought

Like many other democratic countries, Israel is in the midst of a prolonged leadership drought, but the costs are much higher than elsewhere.

By Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The Zionist movement and the early days of the state were characterized by unusually gifted leaders – Ben Gurion, Weizmann, Begin, and Golda Meir – but like the Israelite Judges of 3,000 ago, they failed to develop successors.

For many years, the average age of the "youth wings" of the major parties was close to 50, and the "best and the brightest" of Israelis decided not to wait. Second-rate political operators, dreyers and machers moved in to fill the vacuum, and politics became corrupt and corrupting.

This process is clearly seen in the municipal election campaigns, which are in full swing. Israel is too small to have provinces or states, so the major cities (Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, and Haifa) are the most important level of government below the national level. For anyone who wants to get a start in Israeli politics, to show a flair for public life, this is the logical place to begin and to make a mark.

The position of mayor of Jerusalem, with its political and religious dimensions and importance, is one of the most important posts in the country, even compared to many Cabinet positions.

A close look at the candidates and campaigns in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv is a depressing experience for anyone concerned about Israel's future. In Jerusalem, Israel's "eternal capital", which was brought back to life after 2000 years by Teddy Kollek, the candidates for mayor and city council are totally uninspiring. Kollek hung on for too long, and all of the younger leaders with experience gave up long before he retired.

In 1994, Ehud Olmert, a Likud backbencher, defeated Kollek, who had stopped functioning effectively but refused to retire gracefully.

Olmert has used the powers of his office and the taxpayers money to gain the support of the ultra-orthodox blocks which make up at least one-third of the eligible voters. Under Olmert, the city has continued to function, but the civic culture and sense of pride and unity that Kollek fostered in his early days has disappeared. Olmert has served time, but has not contributed to Jerusalem's glory.

Olmert is not particularly popular, and a serious candidate committed to good government and the vision of Jerusalem as the jewel in the crown of the Jewish renaissance, could win in the current elections. But no such candidate has stepped forward, and the Labor party is reduced to running a former minister who failed miserably in his previous position, and whose chances are close to zero. There simply is no leader (or even unaffiliated personality) in Jerusalem who is prepared to go through the election campaign, and who can present an effective alternative.

Similarly, most of the candidates for the city council are practitioners of the spoils system of politics, supported by various interest groups who expect licences and public funding for their schemes.

In Tel Aviv, the situation is not any better. Roni Milo has decided to retire as mayor, rather than risking defeat, after he built a record marked by friction between secular and religious groups, traffic congestion, and by garbage piled on the streets of "the city that never sleeps". In his years as mayor, Milo has accomplished little for the city, reflecting his lack of vision and sense of public responsibility. But with the field wide open, no appropriate figures have stepped forward to seek this job.

Both major political parties (Labor and Likud) failed to find suitable candidates for this pivotal position.

Amram Mitzna, who began his political activities after a successful first career in the IDF where he served as director of the planning branch, is the antithesis of the Labor party apparatchik whom he defeated. Mitzna is a full-time mayor, whose activities are focused on the needs of his constituents, and not on gaining headlines in the pursuit of higher positions.

Successful in his own right, he does not need to buy off interest group and wealthy contributors seeking favors, or to play on the fears of different groups, in order to be elected. As a result, Haifa is Israel's best-run city, and a model for the rest of the country. Mitzna could become a major figure on the national political scene, but to date, he has been reluctant to become involved in the mud-slinging and PR campaigns that are the norm in Israel, as in other democratic countries.

In the upcoming decades, Israel will face challenges that are as formidable as those of the past 50 years. To survive and prosper, Israel desperately needs a leadership revolution. On this score, the evidence from Jerusalem and Tel Aviv is not encouraging.

Memories of Dad

On erev Yom Kippur, 50 years ago, my Dad was buried in St. Paul, Minn. It was a sudden and totally unexpected death. I lost my mentor and friend, and the 50 years since his passing have not dimmed my memory of him, nor have they reduced his influence. Much of my rabbinate was made meaningful because of his teaching, and I want to tell you about one aspect of what I learned from him.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Dad had come from a very small village in the backwoods of Germany. In the middle of the 18th century when our family first appeared in the little village, they were poor, and when Dad was born they still were. In time, he and an older brother liberated themselves from their environment and sought a higher education in a nearby town. My dad became a teacher, and I was born in a Jewish teachers seminary where Dad was the rector. Eventually he headed an orphanage in Berlin, where I grew up. It looked as if the struggles of his life would at last be compensated by happy years ahead, but inflation robbed them of everything that he and Mother had saved.

Then the Nazis came to power and my parents fled to England for their lives. They became strangers in a strange land. Upon his arrival in England, Dad was imprisoned on the Isle of Man, because war had broken out. Dad, who in Germany was banned because he was a Jew, had now become a German enemy alien in Britain and was considered a threat to the war effort.

Eventually he was released and he worked hard at making a go of a refugee hostel in Brighton on the south coast of England. I tried to bring my parents to the United States but was unsuccessful – I later found out that four of the five commissioners were outright anti-Semites. I have dealt with this in another medium and I will not repeat it here, for I want to tell you about the man who died 50 years ago, at age 66.

At last he had crossed ocean, but he was still a newcomer to America.

What I remember above all about Dad was his sense of what Jews and their Judaism ought to be. He was firm in his belief that God had set us aside in a special way and that it was forever our responsibility to set an example for the world – not in what we would achieve economically, but rather as a model in our behavior, in our standards and in the way we treated others. That was the central lesson I carried away from the many times we talked about what it meant to be a Jew.

We are special, Dad asserted, but we have to earn it. If we become like the others, we have lost our place in history and have reneged on the Covenant we once made with the Almighty. His was not a shoddy morality that allowed us to have it either way. He felt that there were things that were right and things that were wrong, and this is what he passed on to his children.

The Kirshner File

*Fragments*Jerusalem* defines a city

By Sheldon Kirshner

For the past 11 years, Ron Havilio has been obsessed by a vision of a hallowed city on a hill, a city of tranquillity and strife, a city at once ancient and modern.

"I've always been fascinated by Jerusalem," said Havilio, whose six-hour movie, *Fragments*Jerusalem (Shivrei T'Munot*Yerushalayim)*, was screened at the recent Toronto International Film Festival.

Born and partially raised in Jerusalem, Havilio, 48, is a painter and photographer who turned to cinema as a means by which to distil the essence of a metropolis he knows intimately.

Although Havilio spent much of his childhood and youth in such far-flung countries as France, Turkey and Cameroon, his point of reference was unshakably Jerusalem. In this sense, he has been faithful to the 137th Psalm: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning."

Gentle and soft-spoken, he grew up in the Mamila district, whose fate has mirrored the Arab-Israeli conflict. Until the late 1940s, Mamila was Jerusalem's commercial centre. From about 1948 to 1967, much of it was a desolate, depressing and dangerous no-man's land between Israel and Jordan. In the aftermath of the Six Day War, with Jerusalem reunited, the Israeli government demolished its ruined buildings in a bid to restore Mamila.

In *Fragments*Jerusalem*, which has been applauded at nine international film festivals, including Montreal's, and dubbed into English, Japanese, Korean, German, Italian and French, Havilio painstakingly reconstructs Mamila's splendid and tortuous history.

The saga he tells is also personal, since it is entwined with that of his family. His father Shlomo's side, expelled from Spain during the Inquisition, settled in Jerusalem in the 1600s by way of the Balkans. Shlomo fought with the Haganah during the War of Independence, served in Paris with the Mossad and was then a diplomat in Istanbul and Yaounde.

His mother Haya's ancestors arrived in Jerusalem via Vilna – the Jerusalem of Lithuania – in the early 19th century, drawn by messianic fervor. Haya married Shlomo in December 1947, just days after the United Nations voted to partition Palestine into Arab and Jewish states.

In making *Fragments*Jerusalem*, his first feature film, Havilio faced the challenge of smoothly integrating these disparate components. Judging by the results, he has succeeded. On one level, it is a compelling meditation and chronology of a city in transition. On the other hand, it is a poignant look at two families whose Orthodox traditions gave way to a form of secular Jewishness.

"I had to find a special language to make this film," he explained. "I wanted a film with immediacy and authenticity."

*Fragments*Jerusalem*, which is impregnated with the stylistic influences of the Dutch painter Jan Vermeer and the French novelist Marcel Proust, unfolds through the medium of old file footage, postcards, home movies and family albums. Its score is nothing if not eclectic, being a mix of Portuguese fados, Hebrew prayers, Israeli tangos, Arab pop music and Greek laments.

Havilio, a resident of Jerusalem's picturesque Ein Kerem district, never imagined that the documentary – a word he dislikes to describe his film – would consume more than a decade of his life and drain much of his savings.

Although the Israeli government, the public television authority and the Montreal-based Bronfman foundation doled out funds, Havilio had to supply the bulk of the financing. And to save money, he conducted his own research and filmed and narrated the movie himself.

"It was basically a one-man show," he said, hastening to add that his wife Jacqueline – the daughter of Polish Holocaust survivors – and his three daughters were exceedingly helpful.

Havilio, who teaches at the Jerusalem Film School, rejects criticism that the movie is too long. "I'm not asking people to sit down for six consecutive hours. That's why it's divided into seven chapters and two cycles. You can miss one or two chapters and still appreciate the film. Each chapter stands on its own. People have usually stayed till the end."

Besides, he said, some of the greatest documentaries have been rather lengthy, citing Marcel Ophuls' The Sorrow and the Pity and Claude Lanzmann's Shoah.

If he can round up sufficient funding, Havilio intends to lengthen *Fragments*Jerusalem*. "It's very important for me to do this," he said.

Right now, the film ends in 1947. But if he fulfils his dream, he will take it up to the present day and deal with the integral subject of Arab-Jewish relations.

Havilio, whose political views are to the left of centre, strongly believes that the Israeli government was wrong to demolish Mamila. "It came from a desire to unite Jerusalem. But Mamila should have been renovated, not destroyed."

He does not think highly of the City of David, the emerging Moshe Safdie housing project at the centre of efforts to revitalize Mamila. "It's a catastrophe," he observed, arguing that the new Mamila is being built for wealthy overseas Jews who are mainly absentee owners.

"Mamila is closed most of the time. It's no longer an organic part of Jerusalem."

Havilio believes that Jerusalem should remain open and undivided, but he would not mind if the eastern sector, annexed by Israel in 1967, became the capital of a Palestinian state.

To him, human relations supersede political exigencies. "Jews and Arabs in Jerusalem can co-exist," he said. "We need the Arabs and the Arabs need us."

*Fragments*Jerusalem* will be screened in two parts on Oct. 26 and 27 at 6:30 p.m. at the Art Gallery of Ontario. Cinematheque Ontario is presenting Havilio's movie at a retrospective of Israeli films marking Israel's 50th anniversary.

A guide to the peace process

Much is heard of the Arab-Israeli peace process these days. But as Israel's tortuous negotiations with the Palestinians grind on, the average onlooker is left with the job of sorting out fact from fiction.

What, then, is one to do? For starters, I refer you to Samuel Segev's illuminating book, Crossing the Jordan: Israel's Hard Road to Peace (McClelland & Stewart). Segev, a seasoned Israeli journalist with excellent connections, knows the subject like the back of his hand. He is personally acquainted with many of the players, he understands the issues, and he possesses a talent for putting things into context.

As a result, Crossing the Jordan is an extremely useful and contemporary guide to the unfolding peace process.

A former foreign correspondent for Ma'ariv, Segev examines the Oslo process against the backdrop of the United States' dialogue with the PLO and its consultations with Israel, the efforts by Sweden and Egypt to shape Israeli policy, the 1991 Madrid conference, and the indirect and ineffectual talks between Israel and the PLO.

He argues, quite convincingly, that the 1993 Declaration of Principles reflected the limitations of Israel's and the PLO's powers. But his claim that the Israeli negotiators were not up to the task and neglected security problems is debatable. In any event, he believes that the peace process is irreversible.

An admirer of Yitzhak Rabin, Segev disparages Shimon Peres' vision of a "new Middle East." He describes it as unconnected with "the realities of the region" and suggests that it stoked Arab fears of Israeli economic domination. A point surely worth considering.

Segev's chronology of Israel's clandestine relationships with Morocco, Jordan and Iraq is nothing less than fascinating. Indeed, the same can be said of Crossing the Jordan, a volume that would grace any library.

Let us always strive to rise upward

By RABBI JACOB J. ZLOTNICK

There are those who claim that Noach was a tzaddik only when compared to others in his generation, but compared to the Avos Abraham Isaac and Jacob, he wasn't. Well how should anyone be judged, by those above or by those below?

I know a man who goes to shul three days a year, on the High Holy Days. Compared to his neighbors in his apartment house who never go to shul, he is religious. But to those who attend shul daily, he is certainly religiously deficient. How should he be judged, by those below or those above.

This difficulty in judgment is not only in religious matters. In the economic sphere when is one to be considered rich? A man who has a car, goes to Florida every winter and to the Catskills for Pesach. Is he rich? Compared to others who use the metro and city buses, who brave the cold winters in Montreal, and make their Pesach at home, he is certainly rich. But compared to his local banker, he is a pauper. So how is then one to be judged?

The answer is Bashamoyian Mimal Veal Haretz Mitachus, in the heavens above and the earth below. In spiritual matters, mitzvot, charity and morality, we should compare ourselves to those above us, but in material matters, we should arrive at a point of Hasamach Bechelko, be happy with what you have, by noting comparatively how well off we are.

Shabbat Noach

This was always the way of judgment in religious circles. Ask a typical pious Jew of the last generation about the High Holy Days, and he'll tell you that he is terrified of Yom Hadin (Yom Kippur), but if you ask him how is your chayuna, livelihood, he will reply Baruch Hashem.

Today the dialogue with a modern Jew is different. How is your Jewishness? Reply, "pretty good, I was bar mitzvahed." But how is business?, "not so good, could be better."

The same applies in Jewish scholarship and Torah study. Two Jews came out of the apartment on the Sabbath, one was dressed for shul, and the other to play tennis. The latter was embarrassed. It was Shabbat Noach. Look, I am not going to shul today, but I read in the bulletin that the rabbi is going to talk today about the great flood. Please announce for my wife and myself twice chai for the victims of the flood. Compared to him we are all Torah scholars but compared to true scholars we indeed have much to learn.

In the final analysis, when we compare ourselves to those below, we have no reason to improve. We think we are pretty good. Let us compare ourselves to those above us, and always strive to rise upward.

The Jewish circumcision

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Next week on Shabbat, we will read from the Torah about one of the cornerstone commandments from G-d to Abraham and the Jewish people: "This is My covenant which you shall keep between Me and you and your descendants after you: every male among you shall be circumcised." (Genesis 17:10) [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/genesis/torah/17101711.htm].

Because of its importance, there are many Web sites devoted to explaining the significance and procedure of the The brit (or bris) milah. Over the next few weeks, I will focus on circumcision and on some of the other traditions, old and not so old, that celebrate the birth of Jewish children. (Please note that at this time, I will not be concentrating on the medical controversy over circumcision.)

According to Circumcision.net [http://www.circumcision.net/Joy.htm], the brit milah represents the Jews' eternal bond to God. It is the choicest of offerings, offering oneself (the physical body, and the mind) to the service of the creator. Also, take a look at the LifeCycles essay on this topic [http://www.torah.org/learning/lifecycles/milah/milah1.html].

But why on the eighth day (for healthy boys)? Rabbi Yehuda Lebovics of Los Angeles offers a spiritual explanation [http://www.torahview.com/bris/html/the_bris.html]: "The Kabbalistic writings teach us that seven days represents the physical world of creation. Thus, when a child has lived for eight days, he has transcended the physical to the metaphysical. The covenant joining body and soul, physical and spiritual, can now take place." If you would like to read the actual Halachot of brit milah, see an incredibly detailed site which lists the laws of circumcision in both English and Hebrew [http://www.ben2.ucla.edu/~hepner/texts.html].

Of course, preparing for a Brit can be stressful. California's Dr. Fred Kogen provides a helpful checklist [http://www.beritmila.com/setup.html]. Practical tips include everything from making sure the mohel has a parking space; feeding the baby until the mohel arrives in the house; preparing a pillow for the chair of Elijah; and being sure to disconnect the telephone during the service.

Were you able to attend the brit milah of Benjamin George Zev? I guess his parents wanted the whole world to know about it since the invitation is on the World Wide Web [http://isx.com/~mzev/personal/bris.html].

Alas, there are no pictures of Benjamin's brit but you can look in on the work of mohel Zachary Hepner. Don't worry, all the photos at this site are shot from a safe distance [http://www.ben2.ucla.edu/~hepner/ceremony.html].

Although not an article solely about circumcision, I would like to conclude with an excerpt from a touching piece by Jeff Jacoby, a columnist for The Boston Globe, with his wishes to his newborn son, Caleb [http://jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/paper/article.asp?ArticleID=166].

"You are so tiny, little one. You have so much growing to do. As I cradle you in my arms or watch you sleep in your crib, I pray that life brings you vigor and health, delight and fortune. Like every parent, I want you to do well. But more than anything else, I want you to do good.

Sixteen days ago, you entered this world. One day – far in the future, I hope –you will leave it. If I could wish for only one thing, it would be this: that you leave it better than you found it."

Next week, I'll continue my look at brit milah and will take a look at some new ceremonies that have been created to welcome Jewish girls into the world.

Jewish Life

Judaism isn't lost — we've just misplaced it

By ERIN M. GANO

Guest Voices

It is no secret that in today's fast paced world it is becoming harder and harder to be with family, friends and loved ones. One is no longer considered successful if one does not put in long hours at the office and playing golf on the weekend. One is no longer considered a good person if one decides to spend the weekend at home with the family instead of on the computer. We are continually rushing to finish, but the question is, finish what?

Our goals seem to be forgotten along the way, and the most important thing being forgotten is being Jewish. What is a good Jew? I don't have the answer. Is it perhaps putting on tfillin everyday? It is doing mitzvot? Is it going to shul every Shabbat? Maybe.

But do we even know how to be Jewish in today's race for the finish line? It seems that more and more often, we are finding it extremely hard to incorporate Judaism into our everyday lives.

If we face the facts, we will see that there are very few Jews left. Bubbies and zaydes can't live forever. This is a fact. We must keep in mind how much and how hard our ancestors fought to keep the Jewish race alive. We must also not forget that no matter how hard things seemed or where we were, we prevailed. We must never forget that our ancestors fought for us – for the future of the Jewish people, for the children.

How many young Jews know the reason we eat apples and honey on Rosh Hashanah? How many know why we don't eat at all on Yom Kippur? Or why we light eight candles on the menorah at Chanukah? Not very many.

Unanswered questions

And the saddest part of this is that these questions about important holidays go unanswered for many young Jews because they are uneducated, in many more areas of Judaism than just the holidays. Simple questions. Not complex questions about the Torah or Rashi.

Apparently today the Internet is more important than benching after every meal.

It is a great concern of mine to see that the money and years spent on and in Hebrew school leave many children with very little. If something is not done soon, if we do not educate the children of today, there will be no tomorrow, for they are the future. And right now that future is looking rather dim.

It is true that there are some young Jews who know a great deal about Judaism and being Jewish, but they are almost microscopic compared to those who don't know anything at all. Is there an ultimate answer? No.

We need to find the will to change. Children are always losing things, but Judaism isn't lost; we just misplaced it. Will somebody please help me look?

Richler entertains

Books

By Bernard Baskin

Belling The Cat*, by Mordecai Richler (Random House of Canada, $32).

He is caustic, irreverent, satirical – and harbors unfeigned contempt for sacred cows. Yes, Mordecai Richler, with his penchant for common sense and sanity, rarely fails to enlighten and entertain.

Belling The Cat contains 28 recycled essays – most written in recent years, although a few go back as far as the '70s – on four major themes: books, travel, sports and politics. Deft, amusing and informative, they display the author's sharp-ear fidelity and his eyes for the colorful and preposterous.

There is a surprising emphasis on matters of Jewish interest. In a book review about Sam Bronfman, Richler points out that many of his contemporaries regarded him as "Prost (vulgar, unlearned) as well as a bit of a gonif, while others, who scorned him with equal fervor, were actually burning with envy over his riches. In any event, in 1939, Sam was thrust into the presidency of Canadian Jewish Congress."

The hope was that he would be an effective spokesman in Ottawa for Europe's menaced Jewry. Instead, Sam became a fawning Uncle Tom, more concerned with how Jews were regarded in Canada by their Christian fellow citizens than the plight of his overseas brethren.

About the Reichmanns, the author indicates that the family had been prodigiously generous, lavishing great sums on yeshivot and assorted worthy institutions in Israel, Canada and the United States. "But they did not endear themselves to Canadians at large when they took advantage of an arcane tax loophole… which earned them five hundred million dollars and led to questions in Parliament."

In an evaluation of Woody Allen, written in 1990, Richler praises him as astonishingly prolific as a filmmaker. He also indicates that after Allen wrote an article in Tikkun magazine defending himself as a good Jew, one of his detractors responded, "You tell us that being Jewish has nothing to do with why you don't like yourself very much. Fine. But why, in every single movie you've produced in which you appear, do you portray yourself to some degree as a self-mocking, self-degrading Jew? You're lying to yourself and your audience if you say that your 'persuasion' has nothing to do with it."

H.L. Mencken, was one of the author's heroes. Unhappily, Mencken's diaries showed that he was prejudiced against blacks and Jews. In response to those who defend Mencken's anti-Semitism as genteel, or insist that he was a victim of generational chauvinism (judging of the past by the standards of today), Richler maintains that such a defence is "hopelessly asinine." Mencken is diminished with others in failing to rise above the deplorable biases of their time.

The half dozen travel essays are evocations of exotic places – Kenya, Marrakech, Egypt and South Africa.

On visiting Germany in 1979, he wondered about the people he met over 50 years of age. "Where were you, my good man, on Kristallnacht? Where were you when your Jewish neighbors were being marched down the streets, DESTINATION UNKNOWN? Probably you were too cultivated to be directly involved. Maybe you didn't even approve. But how did you shut out their screams? Did your father draw the shutters? Your mother turn up the gramophone? Where were you, you bastards?"

When interviewed by Jan Wong, a Globe and Mail columnist who is married to a Jew, he said he was asked questions about the Jewish education of his children and similar matters. She told Richler that in her home "we have a seder every Friday night." He responded, "that must be a Jewish-Chinese custom. We manage it only once a year on Passover."

From the clutch of political essays it is clear that the author has little regard for Brian Mulroney, for the ineptitude of Audrey McLaughlin or the shenanigans in his native Quebec by obtuse separatists.

Acclaimed cantor retiring after 25 years of service

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Cantor Louis Danto could have pursued a career in the secular music world, but his love of chazzanut, dating back to his childhood as a synagogue soloist in Poland, led him on a different path.

Next month the acclaimed lyric tenor will be honored at a dinner on the occasion of his retirement as cantor of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, after 25 years of service.

Among the highlights of his career was a performance at an interfaith Thanksgiving service held at Maple Leaf Gardens in the mid-1980s. The cantor sang the Prayer for the Royal Family before an audience of 16,000 including Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip, both of whom congratulated him afterwards. He has performed extensively in North America, Europe and Israel.

But, he said in a recent interview at his home, surrounded by family photos, career mementos and recordings running the gamut from baroque to folk music to chazzanut, what keeps him going are things like the appreciation shown by elderly and disabled hospital patients when he sings for them.

Cantor Danto (né Hersh Leib Marczuk – he adopted his mother's family name as a young adult) was born in 1929 in Suwalki, a Polish town of 30,000.

As a child, he won a scholarship to attend music school in Minsk, where he studied voice and cello. The move, in 1939, saved his life. His parents, three brothers and two sisters all perished in the Holocaust.

Reminiscing about the past before turning his attention to more current matters, the cantor recalled that one of his sisters had a beautiful voice. He speculated that she too might have made music her career. Their grandfather, he mentioned, was a baal tfillah.

When Germany invaded Russia, the young music students in Minsk were relocated to Orenbourg (now Tchkalov), in the Ural Mountains.

In 1943, Grisha, as he was then known, ran away to Turkistan, in central Asia, looking in vain for his parents. He was reunited with cousins from his hometown, and spent some time with them before resuming his musical education.

To finance his return to music school, he chopped wood and loaded it onto a raft, standing in water for hours on end.

After the war, with the help of the Joint Distribution Committee, Linke Poalei Tzion and the Bricha, he studied at the conservatory in Lodz, then at Rome's Santa Sicilia music school, where he studied the demanding 17th-century bel canto technique (the words mean "beautiful singing") that is his hallmark as a chazzan.

At age 20, he immigrated to the United States, having located an uncle through an ad in The Forward. He studied at the Mirrer Yeshiva in Brooklyn for three years.

He married in 1954 and was left with two young daughters when his wife died of cancer. He has been married to Rouhama, a native of Jerusalem, for almost 30 years. In addition to the two daughters, they have a son and two grandchildren.

Over the years Cantor Danto has seen the role of the chazzan change "a great deal.

"With the coming of the State of Israel, the Israeli tunes or army tunes have come into the synagogue...today some young people don't know the difference between the real nusach hatfilah and street music."

That's not a bad thing, he says, but cantorial adaptations from opera, for example, were generally "much more dignified."

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth, calls Cantor Danto "true to the art of traditional chazzanut. On Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur we speak of the ideal qualities of the chazzan, in his case, a wonderful voice and also a pleasing personality. He [has] high standards."

Cantor Danto admits to having mixed feelings about the concept of women cantors, because of his traditional background. In the Cantors' Assembly of America, of which he is a member, there are women cantors who are "very musical and very bright. They exist and they're wonderful. It brings pleasure, and why not? But I can not see the real cantor as a woman, not for me."

Cantor Danto's career has not been restricted to chazzanut, although he has been a synagogue chazzan his entire career, in New Jersey, New York and Ohio before moving here.

His 20 CDs – and he plans to continue recording – include Jewish operetta (several tracks of which were long-lost classics discovered by the cantor on a 1989 east European concert tour), and even German arias, a subject on which he is accustomed to fielding questions.

"I studied the German lied, and it's great music. I have mixed feelings [about singing it]. I studied this repertoire in childhood, before the Germans started to invade Europe. It's a pity not to use it."

"Sometimes I am amazed," said Rouhama, "that all he went through did not make him a bitter person. His goodness is so genuine."

"He's a very dedicated individual and he's always there for his congregants," said Rabbi Barry Schneider, spiritual leader of Beth Emeth." No matter how small or large the group, he gives 100 percent effort as a cantor."

Toronto drops plans for 'McNulty Park'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Plans to name a Toronto park after a man described as a former Nazi have been scrapped.

Earlier this year, Toronto Councillor Tom Jakobek proposed that the city honor longtime Beaches resident Joe McNulty by naming a park in his honor.

Toronto's community council even approved the plan.

But now that McNulty has been identified as a one-time leader of the Swastika Club, which often battled Jews in the days leading to the 1933 riot at Christie Pits, the plans have been quietly scrubbed.

"It's been dropped," said an aide to Councillor Howard Moscoe, who was in Israel last week on business. "It was never brought forward [to Toronto council]. It didn't even go to the parks commission."

Joel Shapiro, an aide to Jakobek, told The CJN the affair began this past summer when McNulty – "very much a landmark" in the Beaches – died at age 85.

A group of residents proposed that a new park be named for McNulty when one became available. Councillors Sandra Bussin and Jakobek considered it a good idea, and took it to Toronto's community council, which approved it unnoticed under new business.

Things blew up when the Beaches edition of the Town Crier newspaper printed a letter from McMaster University professors Cyril Levitt and William Shaffir, co-authors of The Riots at Christie Pits.

In their letter, Levitt and Shaffir quote from a 1933 article in the Toronto Daily Star, in which McNultry was identified as a leader of one of the so-called Swastika Clubs of the day. They go on to say that McNulty "was an unreconstructed anti-Semite who harbored the same negative feelings about Jews all his life."

In their book, Levitt and Shaffir note that the riot at Christie Pits on the night of Aug. 16, 1933 was preceded by several incidents at the Beaches between members of the Swastika Club and Jewish boys.

The club was founded on the pretense of "cleaning up" the Beaches, which on weekends and holidays saw an influx of immigrants who sought to escape the heat of the city, Levitt told The CJN.

Club members sported swastika emblems. Fights often ensued when Jewish boys tried to rip the emblems off, Levitt said.

It was in that tense atmosphere the all-night riot took place, he added.

Jakobek told The CJN that while he supported dropping the plan, the whole affair "has been one of the saddest incidents you can imagine" because McNulty "was like the guy next door.

"Of all the people in the world, he was the last person you would suspect [of being anti-Semitic]," Jakobek said.

He said that in the future, he would like to be informed of matters like this directly by Canadian Jewish Congress, instead of reading about them in the media.

Cochlear implant to aid deaf

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Thousands of deaf people in Canada could benefit from a cochlear implant, and enter a new world, claims Beverly Biderman, author of Wired for Sound: A Journey Into Hearing, published by Trifolium Books.

This new world has opened up for Biderman, 52. Now, at last, she can talk on the telephone, hear the patter of rain on the roof and exult over the singing of birds.

For the first time, she can be called from another room by her husband, Bob Biderman, just retired as an English as a Second Languge teacher. Before she had to depend on reading lips.

"When I first spoke to our son Nic on the telephone, he could hardly believe it." Nic is a 23-year-old arts student at the University of Windsor.

Biderman continues to work as a computer consultant for the University of Toronto.

She is so enthusiastic about the world of sound that she wrote the book to explain the experience of deafness, and of hearing with a cochlear implant.

Her cochlear implant surgery was done five years ago at Sunnybrook Health Science Centre. To date, the centre has performed more than 100 implants.

Although about 20,000 cochlear implants have been done in the world, only about 700 have been done so far in Canada. Here, medicare covers the expense which can amount to about $40,000.

Hereditary deafness occurs in many Jewish families, says Biderman, because arranged marriages were common in closed shtetl communities. She believes it occurs in the Sephardi population more often than in the general population.

The estimated incidence of congenital deafness in the Ashkenazi Jewish population is 1.2 per 1,000, which is close to the estimate for the general population, according to Prof. Bronya J.B. Keats, acting director, Centre for Molecular and Human Genetics, Louisiana State University Medical Centre.

Controversy surrounds the cochlear implant, which requires surgery to implant the artificial sensory organ with electrodes. A microphone is placed behind the ear, and a small processor, weighing about a quarter of a pound, is worn like a beeper or hidden in clothing.

Biderman hopes that in 1999 she will be eligible for a much smaller processor that can be worn behind the ear.

The implant is opposed by many in the deaf culture, the author says. Sign language is favored by members of this group, who make up roughly one-third of all deaf people in Canada.

As a child, Biderman writes, she hid her deafness from her family in Picton, Ont., until she was 5 years old. At the time, her late mother, Fay, and her older sister, Leah, were devastated. Her late father, Carl Klott of Polsk, Russia, who was deaf, was a scrap metal dealer who employed a truck driver to help negotiate his purchases.

Despite her disability, Biderman developed strategies or tricks which enabled her to function in a hearing world. She graduated in sociology from York University, but later was attracted to computers, and found employment at the University of Toronto. With her skill at lip reading she took part in round table conferences and seminars.

Besides Sunnybrook, hospitals in Canada where the procedure is done include: Hospital for Sick Children, Toronto; Ottawa Civic Hospital; Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario, Ottawa; London Health Science Centre; Hotel Dieu, Quebec City; Alberta Children's Hospital, Calgary; Glenrose Rehabilitation Hospital, Edmonton; St. Paul's Hospital, Vancouver; Children's Hospital, Vancouver.

She will be reading from her book at the Jewish Book Fair, Nov. 10, at 1:30 p. m.

It includes a lot of resource material and references which will be valuable to adults and to parents of deaf children.

Gift Funds Innovative Israeli Services

Through the generosity of several major UJA Federation supporters, now the poor, the disabled and new immigrants will strongly benefit from a $1 million. Federations Canada grant to Haifa's Leo Baeck Education Centre.

The gift of $100,000 a year for ten years will support, among other initiatives, legal aid for newcomers to Israel - primarily from Russia and Ethiopia; expanded programming for the physically handicapped and more outreach to financially disadvantaged youth at risk in the Haifa region. All of the subsidized programs are supported by the Jewish Agency for Israel.

According to centre founder and director, Rabbi Robert Samuels, the facility's legal aid lawyer receives thousands of requests a year, mostly about personal status, marriage and how to buy an apartment. "We have become the major legal aid centre for the north of the country," says Samuels. These legal services, he adds, are particularly important for Ethiopian immigrants who have never conducted business through contractual agreements.

With UIA's support, the centre, which has already begun incorporating the physically and mentally challenged into some of its sports and cultural activities, will be expanding services for those with special needs. Among the major priorities is improving accessibility to and within the building itself. "We'll be promoting the availability of the centre for people with physical challenges," notes Samuels.

A significant portion of the grant will also be allocated to the financially underprivileged, especially in the nearby neighbourhood of Kiryat Sprinzhak. "We assist the needy from birth to death," says Samuels, who, with his staff, will be paying particular attention to teenagers by "helping them understand their responsibility to go into the army."

In addition, UIA funding will subsidize scholarships for early childhood students and children attending supplementary school from noon to 4 p.m.

The Leo Baeck Centre, built in 1970 and affiliated with the Reform movement, holds full time classes for over 1500 students at the junior high and secondary school level.

A Trip Toward Identity

It took a 12,000 mile journey to the Jewish homeland for Dr. Elaine Dembe to recognize the strength of her own Jewish identity and her community consciousness.

Dembe began to give to charitable causes, including UJA Federation, as soon as the Hamilton born chiropractor graduated from McMaster University and began her own practice. But it wasn't until she visited Israel twenty years later, on a UJA Federation mission, that Dembe realized how much her support meant.

"Every year I got the phone call and every year I gave," explains Dembe, who has also become a well-known writer, lecturer and motivational speaker. "I saw it as an obligation more than anything else," she confesses.

But her sense of obligation grew into a deep commitment last summer when Dembe saw, first hand, how community dollars help Jews in need, during a mission to Moscow and Israel. Dembe says she was "overwhelmed" by the life-saving work UJA Federation funds and was particularly moved by visits to elderly Jews living in squalid conditions in Moscow.

"I finally understood whom I was helping and how UJA Federation improves lives every single day," says Dembe, who decided to increase her UJA Federation gift as a result of her experience, becoming a leading Lion of Judah contributor.

Before I was giving the minimum," notes Dembe. "Now I'm taking more responsibility because I've seen with my own eyes how much of a difference I can make."

Second Cup to join renovated Bloor JCC

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC) last week announced that the Second Cup will serve as an anchor tenant for a retail development of the centre's Bloor Street frontage that will begin in early 1999.

The announcement came after a municipal committee of adjustment approved a Bloor JCC request for four bylaw variances on issues related to parking, site density, stairs to the outside and the depth of proposed retail units. The committee approval removed one of the last obstacles in the way of the centre's ambitious renovations plan and opened the door to a full-scale capital fundraising campaign that will also kick off in early 1999.

"It looks like it's all falling into place easily," said Bloor JCC director Bill Emery, who attended the committee meeting. "We're still on track for construction in early spring."

The municipal committee approved the variances after hearing from spokespeople for the centre and after letters from two local homeowners' groups and two business groups were submitted that backed the venture. In addition, local councillors Kyle Rae and Olivia Chow threw their support behind the project, said David Green, chair of the Bloor JCC's capital campaign.

The Bloor JCC's renovation plans include development of its north facade to accommodate five commercial tenants, including the Second Cup, and for substantial upgrades to the rest of the facility. A new aerobics studio, a multipurpose lounge, a 290-seat theatre/projection room, a "cardio theatre," and other renovations are some of the changes proposed for the facility.

The pace of renovations will coincide with the success of the $5-million fundraising campaign, in order to prevent the centre from falling further into debt, Green said. The campaign is sanctioned by UJA Federation and is part of a broader community effort to raise capital funds for the Bathurst Jewish Centre and for a "Y" in York Region, he added.

Five retail tenants

"The Bloor Y is the heart and soul of the campaign because just about everybody in town has passed through it at some time. We're starting from scratch now, and there's a tremendous naming opportunity" for the Bloor Street facility, he said.

Green said the Bloor JCC is being highly selective in choosing tenants to join the Second Cup. When the five retail spots, occupying 6,000 square feet, are fully rented, they will generate annual revenues of about $250,000.

The campaign's goal is to raise enough money to retire the centre's bank debt, which stood at $2.3 million in June, renovate the building and provide the facility with a tidy financial cushion.

ECRUSY reunion ends with late night donut run

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Even if Susan Black hadn't had her cousin's wedding the next day, she probably would have made an effort to travel from her home in Penticton, B.C., for the ECRUSY reunion held here recently.

The 40th anniversary reunion of the Eastern Canadian Region of United Synagogue Youth, held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, attracted over 300 alumni to reminisce, renew acquaintances, listen to '50s, '60s and '70s music and sing a spirited rendition of Hail ECRUSY.

Some 100 ex-USYers stayed for a midnight havdalah service, then 30 or so diehards, not wanting the evening to end, went out for donuts.

For Black, who grew up in Oshawa, USY provided "a nice safe place to hang out" during her high school years in the late 1970s, when she and her brother were the only Jews at their school. Their USY chapter had only six members. "Our parents really wanted us to have a Jewish social life," she recalled.

For Jewish teens in both small and large Jewish communities, ECRUSY has provided a link with peers in other cities.

"It was an opportunity for teenagers to find some common roots in a social, religious, cultural environment where we had fun. It helped to develop, for many of us, organizational skills and administrative ability, and [helped us learn] how to deal with people," said Jack Grossman, who was present as a teenager at ECRUSY's founding meeting in the boardroom of Beth Tzedec Congregation in 1958.

Howard Zweig

Montrealer Richard Vineberg, a past president of the Council of Jewish Federations Canada, got his start in USY in the 1960s, he said.

His continued involvement in the Jewish community is not unique. "It affected us for the rest of our lives," said Rhona Shulman, a contemporary of Vineberg's who serves on two Jewish educational boards in Toronto.

USY existed here before 1958 as part of the LEO (Lake Erie and Ontario) region. The new Canadian region included Toronto, Hamilton, London and St. Catharines, and eventually encompassed Quebec as well as Ontario.

There was much travelling from city to city for regional conventions, as well as to international conventions in the United States.

Carey Miller, who was active in Toronto's Beth Tikvah chapter about 20 years ago, recalled travelling throughout the United States and Canada as a USYer, but also playing host to USYers visiting here – up to 30 at a time. "There were bodies all over the basement," recalled his sister Sharron Lungen.

"USY was a magical time in my life," said Alyssa Maskowitz Zobary – also an alumna of Beth Tikvah – who spearheaded the reunion.

"Each and every one of us took something from USY, whether it was the friends we made, the social conscience we developed or the learning and love of our faith," said Sheldon Serota, a '60s-era USYer who is now brotherhood president at Beth Emeth.

For the reunion, ex-USYers dug up souvenirs including an assortment of convention buttons.

Randy Spiegel, a native of Hespeler, Ont., who belonged to the Kitchener chapter (which also included Galt, Guelph and Waterloo), sported a button with a photo of Roz Garber, whose husband Lou was regional director from 1974 to 1978. "We took pictures and made buttons to raise money for tikkun olam," he recalled.

Howard Zweig, a former chapter president of Beth Am's USY, wore a hatful of buttons, and pulled out a paisley kippah from a 1967 Niagara Falls convention, with the signature of one-time cowboy celebrity Gene Autry woven into the fabric.

"I have great memories," Zweig said. "Those were fun times, and good friendships were formed."

Elaine Pesses, a native of Montreal who was in ECRUSY's Shaare Zedek branch there, called her Toronto USY friends when she moved here at age 21. "I still have my letters that people wrote to me," she said.

Stamp show features Israel

TORONTO — Israeli stamp enthusiasts won't want to miss a museum-quality exhibit of stamps at the Bathurst Jewish Jewish Centre until Oct. 30.

The Canadian Stamp Dealers' Association and the consulate general of Israel are staging a special exhibit of Israeli stamps to mark the nation's 50th anniversary.

The show, entitled The Running Stag: Images of Israel in Postage Art, will showcase 275 stamps on loan from the Museum of the Jewish Family, in Durham, N.C.

It was displayed last week at Exhibition Place.

The exhibit takes its title from the logo of the Israeli Postal Authority. A symbol of one of the 12 tribes of Israel, the stag represents Naphtali, son of Jacob, a trusted messenger, and fleet of foot.

The stamps chosen for the exhibit illustrate fundamental themes of Israeli life, foregoing politics and controversy, and focus on archeology, the environment, social history, sports, cultural life and important conferences.

Included are stamps printed before statehood. These are designated simply "Doar Ivri," or Hebrew Post, and were printed when it was still illegal for Jewish settlers to print stamps.

London rescinds 'European Heritage Week'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a hastily convened meeting, London City Council annulled a proclamation issued to a white supremacist group that would have designated Oct 12 to Oct. 18 as European Heritage Week.

Thirteen members of city council voted unanimously to rescind a decision by a city clerk to issue the proclamation. They acted after Canadian Jewish Congress warned them that the proclamation would play into the hands of a white supremacist group led by convicted hatemonger Donald Andrews.

Although "the wording of the proclamation was quite benign, it was the possible use to which it might be put, to lend credence to an organization that apparently has white supremacist ties" that led council to rescind the proclamation, London Mayor Dianne Haskett explained.

Such a proclamation could be construed as "an endorsement of the organization and its activities and [would] lend support and often credence to what it stands for," she added.

The original decision to issue the proclamation was made by city clerk Jeff Malpass, who told the London Free Press he had never heard of the group submitting the proclamation request, the European Heritage Committee of Toronto. Malpass said the proclamation's words did not contravene city guidelines and he suggested failure to approve it could have put the municipality in jeopardy of being accused of discrimination.

(Last year, Haskett was fined $10,000 for failing to declare a Gay Pride weekend.)

London city council took the unusual step of meeting late on the Friday night before Thanksgiving to order the proclamation rescinded. If they had not met at that time, the proclamation would have taken affect on the following Monday, and run during the Simchat Torah holiday, Haskett said.

Working with Deputy Mayor Anne-Marie DeCicco, Haskett arranged for 13 councillors – enough for a quorum – to return to City Hall for the impromptu meeting. Earlier in the day, Congress had supplied the mayor with an extensive dossier on Andrews and his previous efforts to convince municipalities to issue the proclamation. Included was a 1995 letter from former Toronto mayor Barbara Hall to then Metro chair Allen Tonks on Andrews' efforts, as well as a 1994 report by the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC).

That report noted that Andrews has been a prominent figure in extremist circles in Toronto, and that he spent two years in jail in the mid-1970s for plotting to bomb a visiting Israeli soccer team. On his release from prison, he established the Nationalist party of Canada, which "appealed to the basest instincts of those who joined it: anti-immigrant, anti-gay, fearful of the disappearance of the white race around the world, anti-affirmative action, anti-black and anti-Jewish."

Keith Landy, chair of Congress' Ontario region, said "this is not the first time that Congress has learned of the insidious work of Donald Andrews and his group."

Only last month, Congress blocked Andrews' effort to convince the town of Markham to designate a European Heritage Week. A few years ago, the cities of Halifax and Victoria rescinded similar proclamations after they learned of the identities of those advancing it, he said.

Meanwhile, in London, a debate is raging over whether the city should issue similar proclamations in the future. Haskett believes London should get out of the business of issuing the proclamations.

"We have a lot of other positive issues to discuss and this can be time consuming," she said.

Fabric artist puts personal touch into Torah covers

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Local fabric artist Elena Keen has gained widespread recognition and admiration for what started out as a small "repair job" for her rabbi.

In 1994, while saying Kaddish for her late mother, Keen noticed that the hem of one of the Torah covers at Congregation Machzikei Hadas was coming undone and asked Rabbi Reuven Bulka if he would like her to mend it.

He replied that all of the covers were in poor condition. So, when they were replaced with white covers for the High Holy Days, Keen picked up the old ones to repair them.

Keen, who comes from a long line of tailors and seamstresses, had an idea that she would like to replace one of the covers with a new one of her own design in memory of her mother.

She was born in Romania, where she, her mother and sister were hidden and her father was interned in a labor camp during World War II. After the war, the family emigrated to South America.

Her mother insisted upon passing along her tailoring skills to her daughters. Keen remembers that "we girls were required to do a certain amount of sewing every day. We learned to do exact work, haute couture. We spent innumerable hours doing embroidery, knitting and other needlework."

But Keen's father was an accountant and wanted his daughter to follow in his footsteps. "He encouraged me to study something practical, to prepare for the future," she recalls. She studied economics and business management, and also obtained the equivalent of a BA in English and translation.

These skills came in handy when Keen arrived in Canada in 1964. She has worked part time for many years at Carleton University in the systems and computer engineering department and as a freelance translator.

Sewing has always been a hobby, but a chance encounter led her to quilting and the birth of her new "career."

While playing bridge in a neighborhood bridge club when she first came to Ottawa, Keen was struck by the beauty of a quilt being displayed by one of the members who made one annually as a raffle prize.

Shortly afterwards, while strolling through the Byward Market, Keen says, "I noticed a quilt stall advertising classes for quilting and I registered for the course on the spur of the moment. I never looked back. I became thoroughly addicted. I joined the local guild and the national association and volunteered everywhere. I was on the board of the Canadian Quilters Association twice and am still actively involved."

The Torah cover that Keen designed in memory of her mother is done in golds, russets and blues. It incorporates the image of candlesticks, the ones that her mother had used throughout her lifetime.

Keen's family, though ardent Zionists, were not religiously observant. However, her mother always lit candles on Friday night and this image remains with her.

The response of the congregants when the special Torah cover was unveiled was overwhelmingly enthusiastic. Almost immediately, other members of the synagogue began to approach her to commission covers in honor, or in memory, of their loved ones. She has worked many long hours to fulfil each request.

Each design incorporates something personal, and each cover entails approximately 300 hours of work and contains several hundred dollars worth of materials, including specially hand-dyed fabric.

In addition to the hand-quilting, embroidery and other forms of needlework – including bobbin lace – add to the cover's beauty.

Keen does a preliminary design after consultation with the client, then shows it to the client and to a rabbi to ensure that it meets halachic requirements and that any Hebrew writing is correct. Only then does she begin to sew.

The practical aspects of the design also have to be worked out. Keen has figured out how to make the covers so that they can be easily removed for cleaning.

"I construct it as a wall hanging which wraps around and fastens with velcro. I give each work a name and attach a label with the name, who donated it and for what occasion, and I also attach a care label."

Having completed all eight covers for the Torahs at Machzikei Hadas, Keen is working on several for another local synagogue and is continuing to receive commissions to do more.

"I consider the time that I spend on this time for meditation, a form of prayer. I put an awful lot of myself into it. The day that I no longer feel this way, I will stop doing it," she says.

Quebec court rejects kosher food importer's appeal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Judge rules that impact of legislation and regulation would be negligible

MONTREAL — An appeal by an importer of kosher food who was charged with violating federal laws concerning nutritional information on packaging has been thrown out by a Quebec Superior Court judge.

Three charges against Les Importations Cacheres Hahamovitch Inc. under the Food and Drug Act (FDA) will stand after Judge Pierre Pinard dismissed arguments that the legislation is unconstitutional because it violates religious freedom and exceeds the federal government's jurisdiction in the area of health, which is principally a provincial responsibility. It was claimed that it is impractical for the manufacturer or importer to affix different labels for the Canadian market because it is too small to justify the extra cost.

The company's lawyer, Paul Nadler, said this is the end of the line for the case, which has dragged through the courts for six years. The fines for the charges total $850, but Nadler emphasized that money was never the issue. The goal was to show that Canada's regulations on the labelling of imported foods are "oppressive" to the Jewish community because they have the effect of barring non-complying kosher products from the country and limiting the choice of consumers for whom what they eat is an essential part of their religion.

The charges related to two U.S.-made kosher for Passover brands of crackers and cookies that bore claims on the packages of "no cholesterol, low in saturated fats," and "low sodium," but did not conform to the Canadian standards that permit such claims to be made.

Pinard wrote in his decision: "In the circumstances, it does not appear to me realistic to draw the conclusion that the legislation and its regulation would have an impact more than negligible on the practice of the Jewish religion in Montreal or elsewhere in Canada.

"No member of the Jewish community is obliged to eat this kind of biscuits and indeed, there are very few who are eating them. On the other hand, nearly the whole range of kosher foods is available in Montreal or in Canada, including even the kind of products and foods that represent only a tiny part of the market here."

Moreover, Pinard said the appellant had not shown that the additional cost of changing the packaging to conform to Canadian law "would represent a substantial burden for the practising Jewish community, quite the contrary." Pinard said the company had not entered as evidence any study specifying what the extra cost would be.

"I am therefore of the opinion that the inconveniences following from the legislation and its regulation does not reach the threshold where one can speak of a real violation of the Charter (of Rights and Freedoms) in the meaning of the jurisprudence..." and so the request for a constitutional exemption cannot be considered, he said.

In arriving at his judgment, Pinard noted that it was not contested that the two products in question have "no special religious significance" or that they must be used in "Jewish rites."

"In summary, no one is obliged to eat these biscuits. It's a question of personal taste. In fact, the evidence reveals that this type of food only interests a tiny part of the Jewish clientele" – 150 to 200 cases a year of the crackers and 75 to 100 cases a year of the cookies were imported.

Pinard also affirmed that the federal Parliament is within its bounds to enact legislation to protect public health including what goes on food packaging.

In February 1992, federal inspectors found in Hahamovitch's warehouse in St. Laurent 288 packages of Sun Valley oat bran cookies that carried on their label claims of "no cholesterol" and "low in saturated fats" without listing on the nutritional panels the amount of polyunsaturates, monosaturates and saturates in grams per portion or the amount of cholesterol in milligrams per portion as required by the FDA.

They also discovered 168 packages of Lieber's crackers carrying claims of "low sodium" and the information that they contained 55 mg of sodium per half-ounce, while Canadian law is that the maximum is 40 mg per 100 g.

Although federal regulations requiring bilingualism are waived during the Passover period, there is no explicit exemption from compliance with nutritional norms when such claims are made.

"It makes sense for an importer of cyanide to be obliged to put on his product that it is poisonous and dangerous on the label, but we're talking about food. I don't think these kinds of regulations are essential, and they only add to the confusion for the consumer," Nadler told The CJN.

He contends that the legislation was developed in consultation with domestic manufacturers who can easily comply and have an interest in not encouraging competing imports. Furthermore, he said the experts in nutrition are continually changing their opinions on what is best for consumers' health and the regulations themselves are out of date to the mind of some.

"The judge was perfectly within his jurisdiction to say that the law is irrational when viewed in the context of scientific fact, but that would have taken tremendous courage."

Montreal Jewish schools facing tough realities

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — One of the principles at FEDERATION CJA has been that every Jewish child, regardless of ability to pay, is entitled to a Jewish education.

Yet it is hardly a secret that the community is also facing some pretty tough realities, although three-quarters of Montreal's Jewish children receive some form of Jewish education, with over 50 percent attending Jewish elementary schools and nearly 30 percent going to Jewish high schools.

It is true that the day school system – with 17 sites at 24 locations – has seen yearly increases in enrolment in kindergarten through Grade 11.

But the community is also being faced with a continuing erosion of provincial government support for the secular portion of students' studies – a trend expected to continue despite continuous Jewish community lobbying – in an era where balancing the provincial books is the new mantra. Last year, that support dropped to $18 million, from about $20 million the previous year.

In addition, the demand for "scholarships," a euphemism for community aid for tuitions, is going up and is likely to keep heading in that direction, according to Shlomo Shimon, longtime director of the Jewish Education Council (JEC).

One reason, he said, is a rise in the number of Jewish immigrants to the city. About 40 percent of Jewish students now get some level of financial aid, and the federation set aside $1.75 million towards "tuition assistance" for the1997-98 school year, an increase of $200,000 over the previous year.

Another reason is that parents, because of the government cutbacks, are facing higher tuition fees, on average increases of about $750.

Yet another is the government's recent crackdown on practices related to school foundation donations. Parents used to be able to make such donations, use them for partial payment of tuition fees, and then get tax receipts, in effect reducing their tuition fees.

But now, because of the stricter enforcement of the law that disallows any "consideration" given in exchange for charitable (foundation) contributions, that is no longer the case, and Shimon suggested the overall net effect will be to increase tuition costs to families by $1,000 per year.

The concern is that even though Jewish school fees here are about half of those in Toronto, there could be an effect on future Jewish school registration.

That will probably not be known until the 1999-2000 school year, said Maxyne Finkelstein, FEDERATION CJA's executive director.

It "absolutely will," however, impact on the demand for scholarships, she predicted. The hardest-pressed families will most likely be from the middle and lower-middle classes.

Shimon and Finkelstein, interviewed in the midst of the annual Combined Jewish Appeal campaign, alluded to the continuing need for community support of the federation in light of such challenges.

JEC, for example, has hired an education consultant to develop ways in which the number of Jewish students in the system, which tend to dwindle from the earliest to the last grades, can in fact be retained.

"Jewish schools have to remain competitive," Finkelstein said, both she and Shimon pointing to the fact that the age of technology has made it essential for Jewish schools to keep up with the latest advances.

"There is a positive mood in the schools, with a better thought-out and prepared curriculum," Shimon said.

New Beis Medrash program in Hamilton

HAMILTON — The Yeshiva of Hamilton has announced a new comprehensive Beis Medrash program which starts this fall.

The program is designed to allow the serious yeshiva student full or part-time study in the Beis Medrash, with the option of taking classes at nearby McMaster University and receiving a Bachelor of Talmudic Law through the yeshiva's own accredited degree program.

The Beis Medrash will operate in conjunction with a full-time Kollel, consisting of a group of senior avreichim (rabbinic fellows) coming from Ner Israel Yeshiva in Baltimore.

Students in the yeshiva are invited to join and participate in the Kollel's own in-depth learning and chavuras (small classes/discussions).

The Beis Medrash is currently learning Baba Metziah — third perek – in its morning seder and Masechtes Beitzah in the afternoon. The Kollel's night seder will provide supplementary learning opportunities for students in the mesivta and Beis Medrash, in conjunction with its programs available to the greater Hamilton community.

For more information, contact the Yeshiva of Hamilton at 905-528-5451, or rosh kollel Rabbi Tzvi Sendler at 905-527-1102.

MM Interiors – Designing with a difference

For more than thirty years, Miriam Muller, owner of MM Interiors, has used her exceptional taste and expertise to design homes of many affluent professionals in the Toronto area. Miriam, a member of A.R.I.D.O. – I.D.C., is dedicated to ensuring that a client's taste is brought into focus with fresh and innovative ideas. With professionalism and excellence, she completes every design project down to the smallest detail. Her goal, she says, is to always provide a beautiful and functional living space.

Muller, who came to Canada from Israel in 1961 after a successful career in education decided to change her profession and study interior design. In 1996, she opened MM Interiors, her first boutique. She later went on to open a 3000 sq. ft. showroom and design studio in Markham. In 1989, she opened a one-stop design centre in Canada, a 16,000 sq. ft. showroom – Design Concepts. This showroom provided a valuable resource for the general public and trade featuring the latest trends in design for the home or business. It was a great concept, where customers could save time and find everything they needed under one roof, and receive professional advice.

After two years, with a looming recession, Muller closed Design Concepts and reopened her business in her Thornhill home. The house became a designer showcase, providing her customers the possibility to view a complete decor in a home environment.

She is proud that many of her clients are now second generation. "I've designed their parent's home and now they've come to design their new homes."

MM Interiors' services and professionalism are designed from the beginning to finished installation, to free people from the stress and frustration of decorating their home and from the possibility of making costly design errors.

Miriam will help her clients make their product selection for new or renovated homes and complete the design to the last detail. Her success, she says, lies in the fact that every job, large or small, is important to her. "I assist people in creating an interior design, that perfectly suits their taste, style and budget."

Muller's retail business, "Designer Treasures", located on Esna Park Drive in Markham, complements the services of MM Interiors providing finishing touches, such as silk trees and plants, custom silk flower arrangements and unique accessories and pictures.

Another of Muller's professional accomplishments is her development of a network group of 26 companies called "The Guild" which provides a gamut of professional services for homes.

Miriam is available for a personal consultation at (905) 764-3737.

By STEVEN SPODEK

Now that the school year has commenced in earnest, campus professionals, students, and lay leaders are constantly looking for new and innovative ways of increasing the number of Jewish students "doing Jewish." This can run the gamut of Israel oriented activities, textual study, holiday celebrations or Friday night dinners, to a variety of social events such as parties, concerts, sports tournaments and trips.

Our organizational goals of engaging and empowering Jewish students require us to act with sincerity and an open mind. Many Jewish students are at a time in their lives when they are deciding what doing Jewish means to them, and this group is often not sure how doing Jewish fits in with their other interests. We attempt to engage students by creating opportunities for their Jewish involvement.

Young adults are at a point in their lives when they are making serious life choices and the art of listening is key; in other words, listening to what students want. (Campus is one of the last opportunities for the organized Jewish community to make a positive impact on its young adults.)

Jewish campus life is a microcosm of Jewish life "in the big city," with all its flavors, shades and colors. Hillel is not an enclave set apart; if we were to act as such, we would be doing our clientele a great disservice. Students who participate in Jewish life are not isolating themselves. The opposite is in fact the truth, as Jewish students are helping to create the social, political and cultural agendas on campus and in the community.

One of our many roles at Hillel is to be the infrastructure for Jewish life on campus, and work to help other organizations succeed. This includes our federation partners and its constituent agencies. Each partnership enhances the campus community. A strong Jewish community off campus equals a strong Jewish community on campus and vice versa.

Web page

We continue to develop methods of making our services easier to access and more user friendly. Examples of this include Web pages and e-mail. The computer provides an easy and non-intrusive entry point into the Jewish world. Montreal Hillel's Web page continues to register greater numbers of hits. Although this method is not scientific, it leads us to believe that many more students are searching for some kind of Jewishness in their lives. Technology is creating virtual Jewish neighborhoods.

Hillel International's Jewish Campus Service Corps has made a positive impact in serving students on their own turf. Students increasingly serve in their own communities off campus; in residence halls, cafeterias and student centres. The demands of students require that we contact them in a way that they are most comfortable with. This is not to say that a friendly one-on-one chat has been abandoned as a method of interaction. Technology has not made it easier for students to share ideas, feelings and suggestions. Relationship building requires us to be sensitive to their needs.

Choosing to participate in Jewish life must be a compelling option, and it is our challenge to provide meaningful experiences. Campus-based organizations need to be viewed as important and serious partners in the world of Jewish culture and identity building, along with camps, synagogues, schools and Jewish community centre's. The potential for educational experiences in an informal setting is limitless.

Students can and do turn the volume up and down on the different products and services that we offer them. By providing them with quality choices, we can capture a share of the student market. Students are not a uniform group. Each student is different and precious, and we need to concentrate on them one at a time.

Netanyahu leaning towards new Jordanian Option

By DANNY RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

Opposition ads attack Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for his lack of trustworthiness, his deceptive tactics and his political acrobatics aimed at preserving his power for the next elections. But the prime minister has a precise political plan that he has recently decided upon in cooperation with his close advisors.

According to various sources, most of them Palestinian, this plan could be defined as a new version of the Jordanian Option touted in the early years of Israeli rule in the West Bank and Gaza.

On the face of it, it contains nothing new. The key part of the Jordanian Option was the famous Allon Plan, according to which Israel was to give back to Jordan most of Judea and Samaria, leaving the Jordan Valley, considered a security belt, in the hands of Israel.

A few months ago, Netanyahu expressed his enthusiasm for something he called the Allon Plan Plus.

According to this plan, the Palestinians would receive only about half of the territory of the West Bank, rather than the majority, as described in the original plan.

The new plan, apparently drawn up by the prime minister and his people, stipulates that when the Palestinians receive the West Bank territories, they will be able to declare an independent state.

But this would not be an actual state: The Palestinians and Jordan would immediately establish a confederation in accordance with decisions ratified in the past by the PLO.

Furthermore, Israel, Jordan and Palestine would establish a regional security framework with the main objective of guarding against Islamic fundamentalists.

It seems that the plan gathered momentum in the days before the Wye Plantation summit. Ariel Sharon's appointment as foreign minister can be understood against this background. The appointment was made after it was agreed with Sharon that this would be the political plan, which he is known to support.

Benjamin Netanyahu

Netanyahu's and Sharon's visit last week to Crown Prince Hassan of Jordan, and Sharon's recent visit to the ailing King Husssein at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota can also be seen in this light.

It's no coincidence that Netanyahu and his spokespeople are keeping up their public criticism of Egypt for encouraging Arafat to harden his stance, while not saying a word to Jordan about its lack of effort to stop Hamas activity in the kingdom.

Israel's interest in the plan is clear. In this way the state of Israel will somehow be able to accept the establishment of a Palestinian state (Sharon has already admitted that its establishment is inevitable).

Thus, it will be possible to continue expanding existing settlements and building new ones, or to build new industrial areas, commercial centres, educational institutions, tourist and recreation centres, and more.

The Jordanians are not particularly enthusiastic about the plan. Since severing relations with the West Bank at the peak of the Intifadah in the summer of 1988, they have no desire to be burdened again with the strife in East Jerusalem, Hebron, and other Palestinian territories.

However, it is very important to the Jordanians that an Israeli-Palestinian agreement is reached. The alternative is an outbreak of violence and turmoil in the West Bank and Gaza that could quickly cross over to the Palestinian community in Jordan. Such a development would put Hashemite rule in danger.

The Palestinian Authority is also unhappy with the plan, even if it provides a convenient way for them to declare a state and win general recognition. The Palestinian Authority is also very dependent on Jordan.

In recent weeks, it was rumored in the West Bank that the Palestinian Authority faced several economic crises, and could not pay its workers their salaries. Abu Mazen and other Palestinian VIPs went to Jordan and succeeded in obtaining financial help.

The plan does offer a number of advantages for Jordan and the Palestinians, but its biggest advantages are for Israel and the settlers. That's why it has almost no chance for success.

Harris deflects criticism of planned Israeli highway

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Ontario Premier Mike Harris chose his words carefully when it came to answering questions concerning the building of Israel's new controversial Trans-Israel Highway.

The project is partly funded by Canadian financing and is being built by Ontario-based Canadian Highways International Corporation.

Harris and Attorney General Charles Harnick had already been subjected to an orderly, but well-orchestrated demonstration outside Jerusalem's Laromme Hotel, where he and his delegation of top Canadian businesspeople, had come to talk to journalists about Ontario's contribution to Israel's transportation development. Among those invited to accompany the premier to Israel was Moshe Ronen, president of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

"The purpose of the visit is to build on a positive relationship that exists between the Israel and Ontario governments," Harris told The CJN. "My predecessors were also very supportive of that relationship, so therefore this is primarily an economic trip. To me, the peace process offers substantial business opportunities in the Middle East."

The premier, following up on what he sees as the success of the Canadian contribution to the $1-billion (US) Trans-Israel Highway, wanted to ensure that Ontario would be considered for the designing and building of Israel's mass transit system, which might include an underground complex in Tel Aviv.

Former Canadian Henry Gold, a leading campaigner against the building of the highway told The CJN. "We know we need roads – good roads – but this project is an environmental disaster. We should be shifting our priorities from road to rail. This is the largest public works project in Israel's history. If this road is built, it will be the centerpiece of a failed transportation policy. We want Premier Harris to repudiate Canada's role in this project, and look again to see if we need our biblical landscape to be turned into an asphalt highway."

Responding to these criticisms Harris said,"Change is change. There are some who advocate not doing anything. In free democracies people are free to express their views. We do care about development, ecology, environment and history, but this is an internal domestic problem subject to Israeli jurisdiction and Israeli laws.

"Engineering will take its cue from its Israeli partners. They are not my environmental regulations, so it is not my jurisdiction. Canadian Highways International – the consortium, has experience all around the globe, and is very mindful of its responsibilities to environmental problems."

The new road will be operated as a toll highway with sophisticated electronic systems to collect toll charges. Last month, the paving of the first 90 km of the road was due to be started, but because of unforeseen delays in finalizing the toll franchise agreements, it did not get underway. The dramatic fall in the value of the shekel by almost 20 percent in the past few weeks has also held up final agreements.

Harris, who was in Israel primarily to attend the prime minister's Jubilee business summit, had scheduled a meeting on his last day in Israel with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. However Netanyahu had to cancel the meeting to go to Jordan for last minute discussions with Crown Prince Hassan before flying to the United States for the continuation of the peace talks at Wye Plantation in Maryland.

Harris commented on the peace process, and how it might affect the economic climate. "There is no doubt that there has been more uncertainty over the past year. When I was here in Israel four years ago, there was a sense of tremendous optimism. Peace was then just a dream. Israelis said at the time, 'Maybe not peace in my lifetime, but maybe now it actually will be in my lifetime.' I think that now there is a new optimism. I think that much of it is based on security but some of it is tied up in economics. Our companies, from the private sector point of view, are encouraged that the peace process seems to be back on the rails. It's different now to what it was four years ago.

"Then it was almost a dream. Now it could become a reality."

"Winning" entrants will be notified by telephone before the start of the Shabbat on Friday, Dec. 4, 1998.

When the prizes will be awarded:
The winning poems will be published in The CJN of Dec. 10, 1998. We look forward to receiving your poems. May the miracle of Chanukah and the magic of its light be reflected in your poems.

STRUB'S Pickle Corner STRUB'S

Vol. 1, No. 6 • October 22, 1998

Hello! How are ya'? What's cooking? I hope you enjoyed the High Holidays with our 70¢ Anniversary Coupon. Look for more coupons and events as we celebrate our 70th Anniversary throughout 1999. A special thanks to all of you who took time to write me over the holidays. It's obvious that Strub's pickle eaters are the most intelligent consumers around.

Letter of the month

Dear Pickle Guy:
Shana Tova. I was just wondering — how long does a New Dill (half sour) pickle remain new? How long does it keep its crunch, and does it eventually become an Old Dill (full sour)? Or, is a New Dill always a New Dill? Thanks.
— M.M., Toronto, ON.

The Pickle Guy Replies

Dear M.M.:
This is an excellent question, and one that people often ask me. New Dills are made from fresh cucumbers, with "Strub's" special brine added to each jar. As the pickles sit in the jar, slow fermentation begins. This causes a slow color change from the initial bright green cucumber color.

The pickles begin to taste more "done" as they sit in the jar, but they will not become Old Dills. "Strub's" Old Dills (with the Yellow Label) need to ferment fully in barrels before they are bottled. New Dills have only a 90-day shelf life. Always look for the best-before date printed on the lid. Thanks for the great letter and for being such a loyal Strub's fan.

Remember, send your letters, pictures, and postcards to me:

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — Walter Kohn, a former University of Toronto student and one-time Canadian army volunteer, is one of the recipients of the 1998 Nobel Prize in chemistry.

Kohn, a 75-year-old emeritus professor at the University of California at Santa Barbara, was also a refugee from Nazi persecution.

He will share the $970,000 (US) Nobel Prize with British scientist John Pople of Northwestern University in Evanston, Ill.

Their research, which makes it possible to model new chemicals in a computer as an alternative to chemical experiments, has applications ranging from the development of new drugs to protecting the environment.

Kohn, who was born in Vienna, fled Austria with his sister, and managed to get to England one month before World War II began. Their parents stayed behind and perished in Auschwitz.

The 17-year-old Kohn was interned as an "enemy alien" on England's Isle of Man and later Canada, but was released in 1942. He later joined the Canadian army as a volunteer.

At the University of Toronto, Kohn earned a BA in 1945 and a masters in math and physics in 1946.

The university awarded him an honorary doctorate in 1967.

After further study at Harvard, and a distinguished career as a scientist working at the intersection of physics and chemistry, Kohn was named the first director, in 1979, of the Institute for Theoretical Physics, located at the university in Santa Barbara.

While teaching at the University of California at San Diego, he was instrumental in founding the Jewish studies department. In Santa Barbara, he is on the school's Hillel advisory board and regularly participates in faculty Torah study sessions.

Kohn maintains close ties with Israeli colleagues, and has been a visiting scholar at the Hebrew University, Weizmann Institute of Science and Tel Aviv University. He has received honorary degrees from Hebrew University and the Weizmann Institute, as well as from Brandeis University.

His wife, Mara, is the daughter of famed photographer Roman Vishniac, who documented Jewish life in eastern Europe before the Holocaust.

Kohn has been a thorn in the side of the University of California for his outspoken opposition to nuclear weapons research at the university's laboratories.

Talks extended in bid to resolve major differences

President Bill Clinton also joined the talks, his third trip in four days to the talks. Whether there will be a deal "is still an open question," Rubin told a news briefing.

As the main U.S. spokesperson publicly briefing reporters on the summit, over which the Americans imposed a tight veil of secrecy, Rubin is the most authoritative source of public information at the talks. "There is time to complete the work if the political will is there to make the tough decisions," Rubin said.

But asked why the political will was not apparent after all the intensive negotiations of the past three days, Rubin replied: "We'll know this when we see it."

In discussions led by Albright, profound differences between the sides have been revealed on several issues.

The third redeployment has become a key sticking point, with the Israelis trying to skip the third withdrawal, and the Palestinians insisting that it is part and parcel of the Oslo agreement.

A senior American source described both Netanyahu and Arafat as determined to quarrel over details and principles, rather than "rising above" the problems to look to the future.

U.S. officials conceded the first two days had essentially been a review of positions, many of which are still far apart.

In addition to the 13 percent withdrawal and security steps by the PA, the two sides also have to clear a backlog of disputes left over from previous stages of the peace process, such as opening an airport at Gaza, and setting up a safe passage for Palestinians between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

One senior U.S. official said a May 4, 1999 deadline for overall peace talks may be weighing on Netanyahu, adding he may fear a violent Palestinian backlash if there is no progress. "I don't think he wants to be the prime minister who presides over the intifadah to end all intifadahs," the official said, referring to Palestinian revolts.

A key Israeli demand is that 36 Palestinian suspects be extradited for trial. Israel claims that 30 are implicated in the deaths of Israeli civilians, and that 10 are serving in the Palestinian police force. According to sources at the summit, the Clinton administration sought to work out a compromise, proposing trials be held by Palestinian courts, but the Palestinian negotiators declined both approaches.

Another source close to the negotiations said it was "no surprise" that gaps remained between Israel and the Palestinians on security issues. For instance, the Palestinians are not eager to share intelligence information with the United States, said the source, adding that the United States has offered "road maps" to improve security and was still hopeful differences between the two sides could be resolved.

PA plans to declare state: PLO envoy

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — The Palestinian Authority (PA) plans to declare an independent state on May 4, 1999, and may yet in the future set up a "small army," the PLO delegate to the United Nations Nasser al-Kidwa said Sunday.

Speaking to a Virginia conference of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, al-Kidwa said he did not think the Palestinians would form a "regular army," and that he saw no need for one, especially considering the expense of a regular army.

Nonetheless, he said, the PA might set up a small army, partly in order to reap the social benefits of having one – like inculcating the value of volunteering in soldiers.

Al-Kidwa was joined at the conference by Joel Singer, who as the Foreign Ministry's legal advisor, played a key role in drafting the Oslo accords, and is now an attorney with the law firm Sidley and Austin in Washington. Singer disputed al-Kidwa's assertions, saying the accords prohibit the Palestinians from unilaterally declaring a state after May 4.

Religious Zionists meet

By AVIRAMA GOLAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Eliahu Bakshi-Doron, the Sephardic chief rabbi, has said Orthodox leaders should cultivate closer ties with the younger generation of the Reform and Conservative movements who, he said, are searching for a path "back to Judaism."

Bakshi-Doron made the comments at the opening of the recent Lavi conference on the principles of religious Zionism. Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, who also spoke, said he would like to see Israeli youth being taught Jewish tradition.

Jewish Agency Chair Avraham Burg said secular Israelis are asking what relevance religion has for them, "and we as observant Jews must be ready to answer."

Yesha council representatives boycotted the conference, claiming it was too closely identified with the moderate religious Meimad movement.

Poetry, photography join to create new art form

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — To Rafi Aaron, poetry is a sickness.

The 39-year-old Ottawa-born poet says writing poetry is "something I have to do. I have no choice. It is the way that I have contact with the world, the way that I problem solve; it is the way that touches me the most."

His travelling exhibit, A Seed in the Pocket of Their Blood, based on the poetry book of the same name, appears in Edmonton and Vancouver this fall.

He is always surprised, he says, that so many people "have an aversion to poetry. They forget that there are so many kinds of poems – poems range from A to Z like any other art form. Normally, someone can find something they can relate to in a poem."

A Seed in the Pocket of Their Blood, the only joint North American-Israeli artistic venture for Israel's 50th anniversary that will be seen in Israel and the Diaspora, explores issues of Jewish identity by linking the poems in Aaron's book to photographs.

Included are works by Time magazine photographer David Rubinger, Montreal photographer Serge Clement; Jim Hollander, chief photographer for Reuters in Israel; and Toronto portrait photographer Ruth Kaplan.

The exhibit, which has already been viewed by over one million people on its 11-city tour, including Toronto (three times), Montreal, Ottawa and Winnipeg, is comprised of 24 exhibit boards, the majority of which measure 2 feet x 3 feet. Each board features one photograph and one poem.

"A new piece of art is created from the two art forms," says Aaron. "We join one poem and one piece of art, and together we have created a new piece of art."

The project was Aaron's first venture into the world of photography, and it took about 18 months to match each poem to a photograph. "I never knew what I was looking for until I found it. I wanted to give people a voice in the photograph. They are telling their story through the pictures."

He has always written about family and Jewish issues, he says, and he dedicated A Seed in the Pocket of Their Blood to his 100-year-old zayde, Benjamin Feinstein.

One poem, The First Pogrom, was written from his grandfather's description of a pogrom: "He remembered the animals/ the barn and ran holding the small hands/ of younger brothers and sisters/ through the corridor of screams the field of pleas/ the stream of blood the last words of Mr. Averbaum dropping/ the children into this dugout/ this was either the best hiding place/ in the village or a shallow family grave."

Aaron, who lived in Israel for nine years, was there in 1990 when Toronto teenager Marnie Kimelman was killed. "That touched me in a different way, because I am Canadian and was born and raised here. I wrote a poem and sent it to Marnie's mother, Linda, who allowed me to include it in the book. One of the nicest things that came out of the whole thing is that I have become close to Linda.

"The poem, After the Death of Canadian Marnie Kimelman by Terrorists on a Tel Aviv Beach, July 1990, is the only poem in the collection that I always read when presenting the book. I promised Linda that I would take the memory of her daughter with me wherever I travelled with the book."

Rafi Aaron

Viewers do not have to be Jewish to appreciate the exhibit, says Aaron. "A lot of people at the CNE's Israel at 50 pavilion were non-Jews who were touched or moved, and had similar immigrant stories. A lot of people can relate to the poems. They have universal appeal. At the CNE, I was not prepared to see people break down and cry, particularly when dealing with European themes. The poems [express] their experiences."

A Seed in the Pocket of Their Blood appears in Edmonton until Oct. 23 at the Jewish Federation of Edmonton; in Vancouver from Nov. 2 to 13 at the Vancouver Jewish Book Fair; and in Calgary from Nov. 12 to Dec. 7 at the Calgary Jewish Book Fair. In January, the exhibit will be on display at the Artists Residence in Herzliya, Israel.

Among the sponsors of the exhibit are United Jewish Appeal, B'nai Brith, the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, an endowment fund from the Jewish community of Vancouver, and two Jewish foundations in Montreal.

Film focuses on Terezin's music

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Theresienstadt (Terezin) was a cultural oasis even as ghostly trains rumbled toward Auschwitz, continually emptying the Nazi concentration camp of its unsuspecting Jewish inmates.

Sixty kilometres north of Prague, Terezin was a hard, unrelenting and congested place. But conditions were considerably better than at other concentration camps. In 1944, the Germans produced a propaganda film which idealized life in this "paradise ghetto."

Filled as it was with top-notch musical talent, Terezin, administered by Jews themselves, was an incubator of music running the gamut from classical to cantorial.

Terezin's musicians and composers, the majority of whom eventually perished, satisfied all tastes, as The Music of Terezin, a British documentary, shows.

The informative 70-minute film is scheduled to be screened on Vision TV on Oct. 26 at 9 p.m.

At first, the German authorities forbade the playing of music. But once they were convinced that they could use it as an instrument of controlling Terezin's 60,000 inhabitants, they generally allowed the arts to flourish.

In this strange milieu, accomplished musicians such as Viktor Ullmann (a pupil of Schoenberg),

Artist illustrates 'the absurdity of life'

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — He's been painting professionally since the mid-80s, but at age 40, Howi Ross still describes himself as an up-and-coming artist.

The wiry Don Mills native can probably get away with it because he doesn't look a day over 30.

Youthful or not, the up-and-coming tag may not stick for long, since 1998 has been what he calls his "best year so far."

He's already mounted one solo exhibit, and has seen art displayed in the midtown corporate boardroom of Standard Broadcasting (corporate parent of radio stations CFRB and Mix 99.9), and he's been invited to participate in next summer's Ashkenaz Festival.

To top it off, an upcoming free exhibit of eight figurative animal portraits runs Oct. 26 to Nov. 13 in Northrop Frye Hall at the University of Toronto's Victoria College.

He was inspired by the novel One Hundred Years of Solitude by Colombian writer Gabriel Garcia Marquez – "a classic. I've read it twice."

The exhibit is about what Ross sees as "the absurdity of life."

Painted in rich color with oil paints on mahogany doorskin wood, because "my experience from people responding to my work is that it's the color that connects," the works portray animals in various surreal scenes.

Ross has given them intentionally absurdist titles like The Sheep Who Knew Too Much or The Elephant Who Could Recite Poetry, riffing off a line in the book referring to "a trained monkey who could read minds."

Ross with The Sheep Who Knew Too Much.

The paintings in the exhibit continue Ross' career-long focus "of trying to make something beautiful and reflect the mystery of life."

An amateur magician, Ross pursued the theme of mystery and magic in his last major exhibit in March 1998, which contained a series of figurative portraits of a magician performing various tricks. Two of the pieces sold to Standard Broadcasting, after an art consultant saw his exhibit and set up a meeting with Standard's president and magic hobbyist Allan Slaight.

Fulfilling an interest in biblical archaeology, Ross has already finished a series of studies for his next major project, a set of works inspired by the Dead Sea Scrolls.

"I'm kind of a closet archaeologist. That was going to be my field until I was 18. That was going to be my life's work. I'm still very passionate about it," he says.

Ross grew up in an artistic household filled with books on the art of Michaelangelo and Rodin. His father Oscar is an amateur sculptor, and his mother Honey "does a little bit of everything," like jewellery and "stunning" coil baskets, which she sells at craft shows.

Sensual and aesthetic experience is the point of Ross' art: Do not expect deep meaning or political statements.

"My ultimate aim is to make something beautiful, so the traditional rules apply to me: color, form, composition. Content is in some ways the least important thing," he says. "I'm not trying to say too much except to make a finished piece that's beautiful and complete as a unit.

"Of course, anyone who creates something always reflects their times," he adds. "But I'm always doing things other people aren't doing, and I never seem to care."

Ross admits he's an outsider when it comes to the art community. "I tend to be a bit of a loner. I don't have a lot of friends in the business. I don't schmooze. I don't go to parties."

But he's not worried that he's taken his time making an impression. Unlike many who want to make a name quickly, he figures most artists don't hit their stride until their 40s and 50s.

Ross' work, though not necessarily realist, is based on figures, and avoids abstraction. He purposely tries to keep his painting accessible to a general audience.

"Even if I wanted to do abstract painting, my instinct is to paint an image," Ross says.

Indeed, his "pet peeve" is that "so much art these days seems to be geared to five people," he says.

Ross, who has a BA in art history from Carleton University, and spent three years at the Ontario College of Art (forgoing his final year for time in Italy), says many artists "have got it backwards" when it comes to abstraction.

"People are studying so much art theory at art school, they're producing art to illustrate the theories," he says. "I find it lacks heart."

Many are abandoning art altogether to study only theory. But Ross says he loves the esthetics of painting too much, "mixing the colors, shlopping it on," to ever give it up.

"It's like music. The radio is filled with electronic stuff. But if you love classical guitar, you should still play classical music. Some people out there still appreciate it."

MIRIAM WADDINGTON READING IN TORONTO

Distinguished Canadian poet Miriam Waddington gives a free public reading Oct. 27, 7:30 p.m. in the chapel of Emmanuel College, 75 Queen's Park Cres., Toronto.

Waddington's most recent books of poetry are The Last Landscape (1992) and Collected Poems (1986). She is also known as a short story writer, essayist and scholar, and is identified particularly with her definitive edition of the poetry of A.M. Klein. A former instructor at York University in Toronto, she moved to Victoria, B.C., about 10 years ago.

One of the originators of modernist poetry in Canada, Waddington, according to the Oxford Companion to Canadian Literature, writes poems that "present a green world as an antidote to broken lives [and] offer the threshold to other selves that we are invited to recover."

Her reading at Emmanuel College will be her first public literary appearance in Toronto in many years.

Another Literary Date: Hal Niedzviecki is the founder and editor of Broken Pencil magazine, the guide to independent culture in Canada, and his first collection of stories is Smell It (Coach House).

Niedzviecki is the featured writer Oct. 24, 11 a.m. at the Books & Bagels literary event at the Bloor JCC. Non-members $8; includes coffee, bagels and cream cheese.

New Film on Lost Tribes: Associated Producers' new feature documentary Quest For The Lost Tribes, which focuses on the present whereabouts of the ancient tribes of Israel, is being previewed at a gala evening fundraiser to benefit the Shaare Zedek Medical Center's new Woman and Infant Centre in Israel, and the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre in Toronto.

Like a real-life Indiana Jones, two-time Emmy winning filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici has set out to solve the 3,000-year-old mystery of the lost tribes by following up on legends and tantalizing clues dropped throughout history. The film is scheduled for broadcast as a television special on CBC in Canada and A&E in the United States next spring.

The preview takes place Nov. 22 at the John Bassett Theatre, Metro Toronto Convention Centre, with a reception from 6:30 p.m., screening at 7, and an A&E gala patrons' party (dietary laws observed) at 9:30. Tickets are $36 (regular), $180 (friends) and $500 (patrons). 781-3584.

Arts Briefs:

• The phenomenal songstress Neshama Carlebach, daughter of the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, gives a concert Nov. 1 at the Leah Posluns Theatre. This fundraiser for Darchei Noam Congregation begins 6:30 p.m. with a silent auction; the concert starts at 8 p.m. $36 includes dessert. 638-4783.

• A series of nine diptych paintings of Georgian Bay landscapes and structures by artist Martin Hirschberg is on view at the Hirschberg Design Group, Inc., 334 Queen St. E., thru Oct. 31. 868-6650.

• Any heavy metal fans out there? Those attending the Aerosmith concert Oct. 24 at Copps Coliseum in Hamilton may be interested to learn that singer-guitarist Jeremy Gladstone of Zygote, the band appearing on a side stage at the same venue, is the 23-year-old nephew of this columnist. And what's more, a recording deal may be in the works.

In the Spotlight: Winnipeg-based writer-historian Allan Levine made a noteworthy debut into fiction last year with The Blood Libel, a mystery novel in which he introduced the Jewish detective Sam Klein to investigate a crime committed in the teeming streets of Winnipeg's north end in 1911.

Now the prolific Levine, who teaches at a private school in Winnipeg, is back on the literary circuit with his fourth non-fiction title. Fugitives of the Forest tells the story of the thousands of Jewish men, women and children who escaped the Nazi ghettos and concentration camps by fleeing to surrounding forests.

During his three years of research, Levine conducted many interviews with survivors in Canada, the United States and Israel, and did extensive archival research.

Fugitives of the Forest: The Heroic Story of Jewish Resistance During the Second World War is published by Stoddart. The 432-page-book apears to be a very thorough and intriguing treatment of its subject. It costs $35.

Israeli singing sensation to appear at Lee's Palace

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts editor

TORONTO — One of Israel's newest singing sensations can consider herself lucky that she escaped injury-free from a car crash that seriously injured pop star David Broza.

Ronit Shachar was in the van that crashed into a pole after a late-night concert at Avdat, Israel, marking the Tu b'Av Night of Love festivities.

Broza, 43, suffered serious injuries, including partial paralysis in both his hands. Shachar, who is appearing at Lee's Palace next week, was lucky.

"I wasn't injured at all," Shachar, 29, said in a phone interview from her house in Tel Aviv. "All I got was a shock. David's getting better but I don't know if he'll ever be perfect."

Shachar's debut album Farewell Innocence sold 35,000 copies in Israel, and she is currently working on a follow-up. She describes her music, a combination of soft rock and folk, as a "mixture of love songs and inner-thinking. I grew up on Woodstock – Bob Dylan, Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young, Joni Mitchell and lots more."

Shachar had the opportunity to meet one of her idols, Neil Young, when she opened up for him and Pearl Jam during his Israeli tour last year. Unfortunately, Young was somewhat elusive.

"I only got to say 'hi' and 'bye'," she says. "He didn't get to go back stage at all, he just got out of the van, ran to the stage and back to the van."

Shachar was discovered by Shlomo Artzi, one of Israel's top acts. She played guitar in his band and then appeared on his album Moon before recording her own album.

Shachar said she's always been interested in music. "I was 16 when I realized this is what I really wanted to do and I started writing my own songs after the army when I was about 20."

Shachar's songwriting has won her an ACUM (Israel's Grammy) for Best Young Songwriter, something the young singer considers a "great honor."

Shachar's original songs are all in Hebrew, but she is considering performing a few English cover tunes at her performance at Lee's Palace (Bloor Street at Bathurst) Oct. 25, 8p.m. Tickets are $16 from TicketMaster 870-8000.

Film examines Terezin's musical legacy

Karel Ancerl, Pavel Haas and Gideon Klein put pen to paper and created haunting works, some of which have found their way into the general repertoire.

Ullmann was, perhaps, the most gifted of the lot. He wrote the satirical opera, The Emperor of Atlantis, which the SS ultimately banned as subversive, and Symphony in D, whose melodic tones still resonate.

Ullmann's compositions are performed with heart-felt competence by an opera company and a string quartet.

The medley of concerts, operas, cabarets and theatres anesthetized many people, helping them to temporarily forget the bitter reality of their incarceration.

This is borne out by interviews with several survivors, including Edith Kraus, a pianist; Ivan Klima, a writer; and Zdenka Erlich, an actress.

Terezin played host to as many as three concerts a day, and since the audiences were discriminating, the musicians consistently tried to meet their lofty standards.

For some music lovers, whom the Germans had denied the privilege of attending concerts in their hometowns, Terezin was ironically a breath of fresh air.

Tay-Sachs screening clinic planned for Nov. 8

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — By all appearances Elizabeth Sabine Fine-Gagné looked like a healthy baby at birth.

Born June 20, 1991, Elizabeth, the second child of Marla Fine and Bob Gagné, did not experience the same milestones as other infants her age, says her mother.

By the time Elizabeth was 9 months old, Fine suspected something was seriously wrong with her daughter, but she says that because her husband is a gentile, she and some of the physicians the couple consulted did not initially suspect Elizabeth might have Tay-Sachs disease.

In the past, the incidence of this fatal neuro-degenerative genetic disorder had been more common among Ashkenazi Jewish couples than any other ethnic groups, Fine says.

About 10 days after Elizabeth's first birthday, the diagnosis of Tay-Sachs was confirmed at the Hospital for Sick Children (HSC).

"It was like a bomb dropped on us," Fine says. "It was unimaginably awful. I couldn't imagine that this beautiful girl was not going to be with us."

Fine spoke to The CJN recently in order to alert couples of childbearing age to the importance of Tay-Sachs testing and to encourage them to attend an upcoming community screening clinic on Sunday, Nov. 8.

The clinic, to be held from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. at the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, is being organized by Jewish Women International (JWI) in conjunction with the HSC. There is no charge for the testing and babysitting will be provided.

Lucille Bensky, who co-chairs the screening with Mitzi Dickstein, stresses that younger generations of Jews "need to be made aware of this tragic disease." A simple blood test can identify carriers of Tay-Sachs, Bensky says.

The Nov. 8 screening is the first major community-wide screening since 1971, Bensky says. She urges Jewish males and females between 18 and 40 to be tested.

Dr. Joe Clarke of the pediatric and genetics departments at HSC says that if both partners carry the Tay-Sachs gene, with each pregnancy, a couple will have a one in four chance of bearing a child affected with Tay-Sachs.

Clarke says Ashkenazi Jews are 10 times more likely to be carriers of the Tay-Sachs gene than people from other ethnic groups.

And statistics show that one in every 25 to 30 Jews of central and eastern European ancestry are carriers, which means that one out of every 600 to 900 Jewish couples are at risk for having a child with the disease, Clarke notes.

By contrast, the incidence of Tay-Sachs among non-Jews is one in every 50,000 births.

But, says Clarke, "as a result of screening carrier detection, Tay-Sachs disease in Jewish babies has become rare in Ashkenazi Jews."

In the last 15 years, there have been approximately 13 cases of Tay-Sachs in the Greater Toronto Area, says Clarke.

Tay-Sachs is not a uniquely Jewish disease: intermarriage may decrease the chances of bearing a Tay-Sachs child, but it does not eliminate the possibility, says Clarke, citing the case of Gagné and Fine.

While Fine, an Ashkenazi Jew, carries the Tay-Sachs gene, her husband, who is of French-Canadian ancestry, is also a carrier, she says, noting that the gene her husband carries is from an English side of his family.

Fine says she and her husband, chose to care for Elizabeth at home and were aided by visiting homecare professionals. They also got emotional support from monthly meetings at a parent support group – National Tay-Sachs and Allied Diseases (NTSAD) of Ontario.

Two months after Elizabeth was diagnosed, Fine became pregnant with her second son, Wyatt, now five. Genetic testing showed he didn't have Tay-Sachs, but he is a carrier, she says.

"I worried the whole pregnancy that [the tests] were wrong. Once you're hit like this you lose your sense of security in the world."

Elizabeth died Sept 29, 1995, between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

"Quite aside from how awful it was to lose her, there was a hole," Fine says. "She was the most important thing I did in my day... You lose this important role in your life."

To compensate for the void in their lives, Fine and Gagné increased their involvement in NTSAD and became more active in helping other parents, Fine says. "The group provides us with a place to continue Elizabeth's legacy."

For information about the Tay-Sachs screening, contact JWI at 630-9313.

Despite advances, cancer still claims kids: doctor

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Although researchers understand much more about childhood cancer than they did almost 40 years ago, the fight is far from over, says a pediatric cancer specialist at the Hospital for Sick Children.

"In 1960, less than two percent of children went into remission. In all of North America, only five kids were cured. Now, up to 80 percent of children – and in some types of leukemia, 95 percent – go into remission," Dr. David Malkin said at a recent meeting of the Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF).

"We still, however, lose too many children. With 300 cases diagnosed every year, we are in a mindset that we need to do something. Although it occurs in only one out of 20,000 or 30,000 children, it is still the No. 1 disease that kills them."

More children are able to go into remission, he said, because researchers are learning a lot about genes. "If a gene is altered, it can end up to be a malignant tumor. If we know the genetics of the tumor, we can discover what drugs to use. Experiments lead to new treatments and to new cures."

Malkin said that Dr. Moshe Oren, an Israeli scientist who received funding from ICRF, discovered in his research the chemical nature of the protein P53, a tumor suppressor.

Another scientist, Dr. Varda Rotter, also funded by ICRF, further explored the roll of P53 in malignancies, Malkin said.

Suzanne Kay, executive director of ICRF said that "research, such as that into P53, gives us results, but it takes years of continuous research."

Kay said she is often asked why ICRF raises funds for Israeli scientists rather than keeping the money in Canada.

"Research is a combined effort. Everyone has to work together and build on their successes," she said. "Research [among scientists] is shared, and we want to ensure that top research continues in Israel."

Israel & the Jewish World

Pope prompted revolution in relations with Israel

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

On Oct. 16, Pope John Paul II marked the 20th anniversary of his election as pope.

The two decades of his papacy have revolutionized relations between Roman Catholics and Jews.

With milestones such as the first papal visit to a synagogue and the establishment of full diplomatic relations between Israel and the Holy See, Pope John Paul has instituted an official Catholic opening to Jews and their causes, unprecedented in 2,000 years of Church history.

His approach, however, has not been without serious ups and downs, particularly regarding the Vatican's handling of some issues stemming from the Catholic Church's action – or inaction – during the Holocaust.

"Whenever we get to the core issues around the Shoah, things get much more complicated," said Rabbi Abraham Cooper, the associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

The beatification earlier this month of Croatia's wartime Archbishop Alojzije Stepinac, accused by critics of collaborating with the Nazis, is one example. Beatification, the last step before sainthood, appeared hardly appropriate for Stepinac, who has been reviled by some as a collaborator with the Nazi puppet regime that ruled Croatia during the war.

Beatifying Stepanic, on whose watch the murder of innocent Serbs, Jews and Gypsies took place, is an outrage," Rabbi Cooper said.

A separate ceremony two weeks ago that conferred sainthood on Edith Stein – a Carmelite nun killed at Auschwitz who was born a Jew and converted to Catholicism – also strained some Jewish sensibilities.

Another controversy was related to a Vatican document on the Shoah released in March. While the document expressed repentance for individual Catholic failings during the Shoah, it absolved the Church itself from any responsibility and it strongly defended wartime Pope Pius XII against the decades-old criticism of his silence in the face of the Holocaust.

"Clearly John Paul has every intention of putting Pius XII on the fast track to sainthood," a move that "will further strain the rapprochement with the Jewish world," said Rabbi Cooper.

The Jewish world was also outraged when Pope John Paul paid honor to former Austrian president Kurt Waldheim, despite evidence of Waldheim's having lied about his Nazi past.

Further straining Jewish-Catholic relations was a bitter conflict in the late 1980s and early 1990s over the establishment of a Carmelite convent in a building adjacent to the site of the Auschwitz death camp.

And although the Vatican established full diplomatic relations with Israel in late 1993, the status of Jerusalem, which the Vatican wants to see under international mandate, also creates problems.

Nonetheless, the strides in improving Jewish-Catholic relations under Pope John Paul's papacy have been enormous.

Official sanction of full-scale Catholic-Jewish dialogue only dates back to 1965, when the Second Vatican Council issued Nostra Aetate (In Our Times), a declaration that repudiated the concept of Jewish guilt for Jesus' death and called for mutual respect and dialogue between Catholics and Jews.

From the beginning of his papacy, Pope John Paul has made the improvement of relations with the Jewish world and the condemnation of anti-Semitism cornerstones of his policy.

Pope John Paul has spoken out strongly against anti-Semitism on numerous occasions, and he has taken a number of other significant, highly publicized, actions to demonstrate his regard for the Jewish world.

In 1979, he paid homage at Auschwitz to the victims of Nazism, on his first trip back to Poland after his election to the papacy.

In 1987, he visited the main synagogue in Rome, where he embraced Rome's chief rabbi and referred to Jews as Christianity's "older brothers."

Throughout his papacy, he has held numerous meetings with Jewish communities in various countries and has met with numerous Jewish delegations at the Vatican.

He has also sponsored events such as a concert at the Vatican in 1994 to commemorate the Holocaust, a menorah-lighting ceremony at the Vatican to mark Chanukah 1997 and a symposium at the Vatican in 1997 to discuss the Christian roots of anti-Semitism.

Despite the progress, however, it remains clear that the implementation of the new, official Church teachings on Jewish issues remains a key challenge.

The new teachings are not always heeded, transmitted or acknowledged – and are sometimes even rejected.

Taekwon-Do heavyweight new world champion

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Corey Mincovitch decides to smack somebody upside the head, chances are they're going down.

At least that was the case at the recent World International Taekwon-Do Championships in Birmingham, England. A 5-foot-11, 241-lb. bruiser, Mincovitch defeated Yahia Alam of Egypt to win the gold medal, and was awarded a gold-plated, 10-lb. world title belt that would make "Stone Cold" Steve Austin proud. All in all, Mincovitch dispatched five competitors — all by knockouts — including the world's top-three rated heavyweights. His championship performance earned him a berth on Canada's team at the 2000 Olympic Games in Sydney, Australia.

Although winning his final match earned him the title belt, it was his first fight against Victor Garibay of Mexico, the reigning world champion, that was the most memorable. It resembled more of a street fight than a scientific, technical exhibition of Taekwon-Do mastery. Mincovitch acknowledged.

It also had the Birmingham crowd cheering wildly as the fighters traded blows in the three-round, nine-minute set-to. "It was an out and out brawl," Mincovitch said. "All the fans were on their feet."

The Mexican landed 10 to 15 blows while "I must have landed 20," he said.

Corey Mincovitch

Jews" on his body, Mincovitch was in a take-no-prisoners mode for that fight. "The Iranians aren't friends of Israel, are they?," he states.

The Toronto-born fighter brought some of the Middle East's bad blood to the mat in Birmingham and took it out on the Iranian. Employing his signature move, "The Eliminator," in which he leaps two feet in the air and delivers a crunching kick to the head, Mincovitch broke the hapless Iranian's jaw quite badly.

He went on to victories over Cuban fighter Nelson Saenz in the quarter-finals and Marcus Thoren of Sweden — the event's next biggest fighter at 215 lbs. — in the semis.

It took Mincovitch four days, and hours in the whirlpool to heal after the competition, but it was well worth it, he believes. Not only did he defeat the world's best Taekwon-Do fighters, but he impressed Canadian coach Steve Kim so much that he was recruited for the Canadian Olympic team. Kim doesn't want Mincovitch to fight again until Sydney to avoid the possibility of injury, the fighter said.

Instead, the fifth degree black belt and Taekwon-Do master will keep in fighting trim with gruelling four day a week workouts that sometimes [illegible] as a day's work on his 21-inch arms and 54-inch chest. "I've come down. I've shrunk," he said of his bulkier days.

Keeping up his strength is practically a full time job for the computer engineer. His diet consists of seven meals a day of a high protein, low carbohydrate fare. It begins with steak and eggs (five whites) for breakfast followed by a 10 a.m. protein shake and salad. At noon he consumes two or three cans of tuna, more egg whites and salad. At 2 p.m., after one of his workouts, he might have a chicken breast, more tuna, perhaps some pasta and salad.

At dinner, it's time for his big meal of the day, an 8-oz. steak again, more tuna. Before bedtime, Mincovitch downs another protein shake. Throughout the day, he supplements his meals with several juice drinks (carrots, apples, ginger, celery) made with his own juicer.

Between he and his wife, their food bill amounts to about $200 per week, the vast majority of which goes to stoke Mincovitch's insatiable appetite. Now, if they could only melt down that title belt...

The Inside Back

Justice delays threaten system

Lilly, a middle-aged woman from New York, made aliyah in 1996, and found that some of the household items she sent by ship did not arrive. In the ensuing lawsuit against the American shipping company, its office in Israel claimed that it was a completely separate entity, and that papers would have to be served in the United States: This procedure would have added months to the trial, and in our opinion was simply a trick.

Therefore, we petitioned the court to declare that the service of papers to the Tel Aviv office was valid. At a hearing on June 28 of this year, the judge heard testimony from both sides, and each attorney made oral arguments based on the evidence and the relevant case law.

As of Oct. 7, we have not received the judge's decision. In other words, it has taken over three-and-a-half months (and counting) to receive a preliminary hearing on whether the lawsuit has begun.

As I wrote in this space some months ago, the delay of justice can pose more of a threat to the rule of law than when the public attacks judges, as we have seen recently. I believe that this issue is so important to understanding the Israeli courts, that it is worth devoting more space to, this time focusing on some of the proposed solutions.

A commission headed by Supreme Court Justice Theodore Orr concluded its work some months ago and recommended a structural reform in the court system. Currently, there are basically three levels of courts: The Magistrates' Court deals with various crimes and civil disputes. The District Court is the court of first instance for more serious crimes and civil disputes involving more complicated issues or more money, as well as serving as the appeals level above the Magistrates' Court. The Supreme Court hears appeals on District Court decisions, and serves as the High Court of Justice for all sorts of administrative and constitutional issues.

The Orr Commission recommended transferring most of the authority down to the Magistrates' Court, thereby freeing up the District Court for appeals and certain specific issues, and relieving most of the burden from the Supreme Court.

On some levels, this recommendation makes sense. There is no reason for the Supreme Court to hear appeals on small matters, and in fact, the burden there is so great that one lawyer told me he appeared on an appeal, and was essentially told by the judges that they had no desire to hear oral arguments, while at the same time it was clear that not all the judges had read the file. Such situations would not occur if the Orr recommendations were implemented.

At the same time, the Orr report has come under fierce attacks within the legal community. First of all, relieving the burden from the Supreme Court will do nothing to help the average citizen, as the lower court will simply be that much more clogged. Since most simple disputes will begin there, litigants will face a worse problem than before.

Furthermore, critics say, judges in the Magistrates' Court are younger and less experienced, and will not be equipped to deal with the complicated issues transferred from the higher courts. According to retired District Court president, Judge Chana Evenor, lower court judges are simply not capable of deciding complicated criminal matters or questions involving patents and other highly specialized matters.

Evenor argues that the problem in the justice system is not structural, but that there just aren't enough judges to handle the case load, and she suggests that a proper solution simply requires budgeting to hire enough judges to do the work. In this way, trials will be much quicker, and judges will also have more patience and will be able to devote the attention required to each matter.

Many of the people dealing with this issue look to other countries, including Canada, for experience and solutions. While a small and concentrated country such as Israel has different needs from a large confederation such as Canada, it may be that some of the successes and failures in the different provinces will be studied to enable Israeli legal minds to fix the system before it breaks down completely.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Sandra and I have been buddies since high school. It is only since she's had kids that our relationship has become strained. She has decided to raise her three children without discipline, or at least that's the way it seems to me. They are never scolded, or even told the word no.

Sandra believes in bringing up her children with positive reinforcement. The problem is, she obviously hasn't read the book on how to do this, as her children, now 3, 5 and 7 years old, are unruly, destructive and have no respect for people, animals or personal property, not to mention the horrible example they show my kids.

The few times I've invited them to my home, they have destroyed things like CDs, video games and dishes. Sandra's comment each time is, "Kids will be kids." I feel like grabbing those little brats and giving them what they so desperately need. Discipline.

Would it be out of line for me to exercise a bit of control in my own home with these little monsters?

Control Killer Kids

Dear Control Killer Kids,

There are many ways to rear children these days, and there are many experts preaching various options. Every parent follows their own theory and most are not wrong, only different.

I don't feel you have the right to interfere with the upbringing of children unless you suspect abuse. What you do have the right to do, is talk to your friend. Tell her how stressful it is when she brings her kids over and why. Explain to her that you are nervous when they run about uncontrollably, as they have broken things in the past. Ask her if there is any way she could restrain her kids without compromising her beliefs.

Possibly you and Sandra could meet on your own from time to time or meet with the children in a park, where the damage can be kept to a minimum.

You must teach your children that there are many different kinds of people and behaviors and they have to respect and be tolerant of others, even though you don't always agree with their ways. You, as their parent, are best equipped to educate them in this very essential lesson.

JEWISH RESCUE

Ask Tamar Pichkhadze.

THIS IS THE STORY OF NEW BEGINNINGS FOR ONE YOUNG WOMAN FROM THE FORMER SOVIET UNION.

Starting over is often a dramatic dream but a difficult reality. Thanks to Chalom (Hebrew for 'dream') – a UJA Federation funded program in Israel – thousands of young people from the former Soviet Union are, in fact, beginning new lives. Young, inexperienced, and on their own for the first time, these are 17-20 year-old olim rescued from the insecurity of the former Soviet Union. Many come from impoverished families. Many have no understanding of their Jewish heritage. All have left the familiarity of family and home behind. The one thing they share is hope.

"I wanted to be on my own and make a new life for myself in Israel," says hotel management student Tamar Pichkhadze. She's one of 1,000 Jews a week from the former Soviet Union starting new lives in Israel, thanks to the Jewish Agency, supported by the worldwide UJA Federation movement. Being separated from her parents is so painful, it's difficult for Tamar to talk about it without crying. But her desire to be in Israel overpowers her loneliness. "Making aliyah by yourself requires strength, patience, maturity and independence," she says. "I'm not the same Tamar. I am more mature. My life has changed. Now I want to help my new homeland."

The community Campaign for Fifty will allocate $1.5 million in new funds to rescue Jews like Tamar facing the fallout from the Russian economic collapse. These additional dollars will also provide funds to maintain 270 Hebrew language courses in the FSU and Jewish Agency camps attended by 20,000 youngsters.

Pact signals shift by Likud

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu points to the Palestinians' willingness to publicly nullify the anti-Israel clauses of their charter as one of the major successes of the land-for-security agreement signed last Friday at the White House.

But a no less significant outcome of the accord is Netanyahu's nullification of the Likud Party's long-held doctrine of maintaining the boundaries of greater Israel.

It is true that Netanyahu ceded a sliver of Eretz Yisrael when he turned over some 80 percent of Hebron to the Palestinian Authority in early 1997. But the plan to redeploy from the West Bank town had been worked out by the previous Labor government.

Analysis

It is also true that his government's long-standing commitment to pursue the Oslo peace process ostensibly entailed a willingness to cede further tracts of the biblical homeland.

But the Netanyahu government's formal pledge to pursue the Oslo process has been, for the past 19 months of stalemated negotiations, largely a matter of words.

Many observers in Israel and abroad believed the premier would not compromise the greater Israel philosophy that has underpinned the platform of the Israeli right for decades.

But now, in a moment televised around the world, Netanyahu affixed his signature to an accord that plainly spells land for peace.

And Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon, a foremost leader of the right for the past quarter of a century, looked on and applauded. The Likud party, back home, issued a statement of congratulations and enthusiastic support for the prime minister.

The White House signing may well turn out to be cataclysmic for the future of Israel – both for its politics and its society.

After this latest agreement, the clear-cut distinction between left and right, hawk and dove, in Israeli politics has been blurred.

By the same token, the planned gathering of Palestinian representatives in the Gaza Strip in mid-December, with President Bill Clinton present, will be equally historic for the Palestinian people. At that gathering, the anti-Israel portions of the Palestinian Covenant will be discarded.

The agreement "plugged the holes in the Swiss cheese called Oslo," Netanyahu told a news conference Sunday at Israel's Ben-Gurion airport after he returned from the United States.

Clinton urged Charter revision

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — Early last week during the summit, U.S. President Bill Clinton told Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat he finally understood why Israel wanted the Palestine National Council (PNC) to reconvene to ratify deletions to the Palestinian Charter, according to sources inside the summit.

At a three-way meeting involving Clinton, Arafat, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, and U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, Abu Mazen and Israeli Trade and Industry Minister Natan Sharansky, Clinton told Arafat: "It was not until now that I understood Israel's insistence on the charter. I not only understand it now, but I agree with them on it," said the source, claiming to be quoting the president.

The Israeli position as articulated by Sharansky was that reconvening of the PNC was not merely a legalistic question of whether, as a result of tangled language in Arabic, the vote on April 24, 1996, indeed deleted offensive parts of the charter calling for Israel's destruction.

Rather, the issue required clarification to assure the Israeli public that the Palestinians have accepted Israel's permanence, because it comes against the backdrop of the use of hateful language in the Palestinian media and education systems.

Sharansky has said in the past that "the PNC is the only lever we have to compel the Palestinian public to accept Israel's existence, due to the hostile climate that exists today."

Until last week, the U.S. initiative called only for the 18-member PLO Executive Committee to ratify a letter that Arafat wrote last January to Clinton enumerating all the deletions to the original Charter.

In remarks two weeks ago to the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, former Israel Foreign Ministry legal advisor Joel Singer explained how Arafat retracted an earlier pledge to prime minister Shimon Peres to declare that the entire Charter is voided, but instead passed the resolution, which was less than the original promise.

The News in Brief

Canada

Calls for IRB Probe

TORONTO — The chair of the immigration section of the Canadian Bar Association has written to Citizenship and Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard to join calls for an independent probe of the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB).

Robin Seligman says an independent and public inquiry into allegations of anti-Semitism, racism and homophobia at the IRB is "appropriate in order to protect the integrity of the board."

Seligman joins national Jewish groups in calling for an inquiry, following reports that the IRB's chair took some 10 months to investigate a mock Nazi salute by the deputy chair, and only after a complaint was lodged by a board member, a Holocaust survivor.

Trustee Acclaimed

TORONTO — A school trustee who once made a controversial remark about Jews has been acclaimed the NDP's candidate in the provincial riding of York West. In 1993, Stephanie Payne was at the centre of a storm for publicly stating that it is "usually" Jews who produce plays that defame blacks. Her remark came as blacks were protesting the imminent opening of Show Boat. Payne, then a trustee of the North York Board of Education, later apologized for the comment but said she did not feel it was anti-Semitic.

Lands Purchased

CALGARY — The Calgary Jewish Community Council has signed an agreement to purchase private lands for about $1.7 million. The seven acres will allow community institutions to expand their operations and allow space for a future community campus.

Dickson Remembered

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) said it was saddened to learn of the recent death of former Supreme Court Chief Justice Brian Dickson. CJC honorary legal counsel Ed Morgan said Dickson's rulings on freedom of religion and equality rights "demonstrated particular sensitivity to minority religious communities in Canadian society."

Israel

Bar Israelis: Rubinstein

JERUSALEM — The recently opened gambling casino in Jericho could face a major shortage of customers if Israel's attorney general has his way. Elyakim Rubinstein announced last week that Israelis, the casino's main source of customers, should be barred from gambling there. In his decision, he cited a regulation that authorizes local courts to try Israeli citizens for offences committed in the Palestinian self-rule areas. Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani said he was surprised by Rubinstein's position, but that police would enforce it if called upon.

Knesset Honors Americans

JERUSALEM — The Knesset is set to award four Americans its Conscience and Courage award in recognition of their work in securing restitution for Holocaust survivors. The award is to be presented by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu at a special Nov. 17 Knesset ceremony to Undersecretary of State for Economic Affairs Stuart Eizenstat, World Jewish Congress President Edgar Bronfman, Senator Alfonse D'Amato and New York City Comptroller Alan Hevesi.

World

Deportation Upheld

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Board of Immigration Appeals has upheld a 1997 order to deport a 77-year-old retired foundry supervisor for covering up his past as a guard at Nazi concentration camps during World War II. The order directed that Ferdinand Hammer of Sterling Heights, Mich., be deported to his native Croatia. In 1996, Hammer was stripped of his U.S. citizenship for concealing his Nazi past.

No Tax On Reparations

TRENTON, N.J. — New Jersey residents who receive Holocaust reparations from Swiss banks will not have to pay state income tax on the funds. Gov. Christine Todd Whitman signed legislation last week that exempts the 4,485 Holocaust survivors and their heirs living in the state.

Fund For Slave Laborers

FRANKFURT — In a reversal of the previous government's policy, Germany's new centre-left coalition has pledged to help establish a fund to compensate Nazi-era slave laborers. Chancellor-elect Gerhard Schroeder said last week there are no concrete plans yet for the fund, but "we've already started thinking about" working with several German firms to deal with compensation.

Orthodox Man Released

NEW YORK — A Virginia jail recently released an Orthodox Jewish man because kosher meals cost an additional $70 a day. Neil Lederman, who was serving time for writing a bad cheque, was released after three weeks and placed on home detention. Outraged prosecutors asked police to investigate whether Lederman's meal requests were valid.

Auschwitz Doctor Denies Taking Part in Atrocities

FRANKFURT — A former Nazi doctor who admitted to working at Auschwitz has denied that he took part in atrocities. Prosecutors in Munich began investigating Hans Muench after he was quoted in a recent interview in the German news magazine Der Spiegel as saying that he was not bothered by working at Auschwitz and that gassing Jews spared them from further suffering.

"I could conduct experiments on people that otherwise are only possible with rabbits. That was an important contribution to science," Muench said. He also said that after two or three days, it was easy to adjust to life at the death camp.

Prosecutors in Frankfurt have also reopened multiple investigations into the wartime actions of Muench, who is alleged to have infected prisoners with malaria. Previous investigations were dropped due to lack of evidence. But the Prosecutor's Office says new evidence has surfaced from files that were found in the archives of the Stasi, the former East German security service.

Muench, who lives in a village in Bavaria, claimed in the magazine interview that he "saved many people" by killing a few.

Canada 'haven' for terror groups: U.S. expert

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada is a haven for Middle East terror groups, says a U.S. expert.

Groups like Hezbollah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad not only operate in Canada, but do so with relative "impunity," says Yehudit Barsky, who monitors the North American activities of Arab groups associated with terrorism.

In the United States and Canada, these organizations concern themselves mainly with fundraising, recruitment and providing "moral support" for their headquarters back home, says Barsky, senior Mideast research analyst for the New York-based Anti-Defamation League.

Since Canada is a free and peaceful place, organizations linked to Mideast terror organizations can go about raising cash, speaking to local Muslims and communicating freely with their counterparts in the United States – all in obscurity, Barsky told The CJN in an interview prior to addressing community leaders at B'nai Brith Canada headquarters.

"No one [in Canada] really knows who these groups are," she said. Canada, she said, is where the United States was five years ago when it comes to battling the problem.

Barsky said that not even the 1993 World Trade Centre bombing jolted Washington awake, even though six people were killed and several radical Arabs, including an Egyptian cleric with a huge following, were convicted in the attack.

She said it took the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, in which over 200 were killed, to get the United States to begin monitoring international terrorism seriously – ironic, she noted, given that domestic terrorists are suspected of carrying out the attack.

Washington has begun clamping down on border controls and curtailing the fundraising of domestic Islamic organizations, she noted.

On both sides of the border, she said, representatives of Mideast groups, or organizations with ties to them, operate under the guise of social welfare and charity groups, mosques and clubs – all with innocuous sounding names. "There are quite a few of these fronts."

Canada is regarded by Mideast terror organizations as a country relatively easy to enter, where communications, whether by fax, telephone or modem, are not monitored, she said.

> Terrorists can enter relatively easily

"They can go about their business quietly."

That business is to establish an infrastructure: raising money, usually cash which can be easily transferred overseas, and recruiting young people. Canada is also the closest foreign country to large American cities.

It is not in these groups' interest to attack domestic targets. But even if they do, their members do not fear North American jails, which are plush compared to those in the Mideast, Barsky noted.

If officials suspect their activities, "they defend their right, or move on."

Barsky's views mirror recent statements by the head of Canada's spy agency.

Testifying before a Senate committee, Ward Elcock said Canada is home to more international groups than any other country except perhaps the United States.

"We know that the infrastructure has been established here to support a terrorist act in Canada," said Elcock, director of the Canadian Intelligence Security Service (CSIS).

Over the past decade, many terrorist groups have begun using Canada as a haven, a source of financial and material support and even as a base of operations, he said.

He cited Canadian ties to the World Trade Centre bombing and suicide bombings in Israel.

He said CSIS is investigating about 50 organizations, including groups linked to Hezbollah and Hamas.

CSIS said last year that Hezbollah has established an infrastructure in Canada that can assist terrorists seeking safe haven in North America.

An admitted member of the Saudi Hezbollah who was detained by Ottawa on suspicion that he helped carry out a 1996 bombing that killed 19 Americans in Saudi Arabia, was said to have provided CSIS with evidence that Hezbollah has set up a base of operations in Canada.

The same was found in 1994, when a suspected member of Hezbollah was deported from Canada.

And in 1991, Ottawa admitted that it allowed a man wanted by French police as a member of Islamic Jihad into Canada as a refugee. The man later fled the country.

Barsky said that one of two Palestinian men arrested for planning the bombing of a Brooklyn subway last year sneaked in and out of Canada with ease.

She said one way to fight all this is for countries "not to give in to the notion that changes to laws will make you less democratic."

Sacred and profane

Most of us shook our heads in disbelief last week when we read Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's outlandish "baseball bat" remark made in the House of Commons.

He was responding to a taunt/question from the Opposition during Question Period regarding the use of pepper spray by the RCMP against student protesters at the APEC summit last fall.

I reproduce the relevant portion of the prime minister's answer, translated from the French, as it appeared in the media:

"Apparently, this [the use of pepper spray] was a new one [method of crowd control] that I didn't even know about. The MP claims that this can cause damage to the person. If she is still suffering, I am sorry about that.

"Instead of taking a baseball bat or something else, now they are trying to use more civilized methods. And that's why they [the RCMP] had towels on hand at the same time to help."

Based upon the tone and the substance of the remarks and upon the accompanying prime ministerial demeanor, flustered and shrugging his shoulders, it seems clear the response was intended without guile or mischief. The prime minister was not trying to be coy or cunning. He truly did not understand the offence in his answer.

But the lack of malice in the response was irrelevant.

It was utterly insensitive, inexcusable and thus, unacceptable. That the prime minister could even think of, let alone express, the possibility of the use of a baseball bat to control an unfriendly, non-violent crowd was breathtaking and ultimately, very sad.

That "incident" last week was merely another example in a recent pattern of inappropriate behaviors by the prime minister. But he is not the only political leader whose behavior leaves the electorate shaking their heads.

For example, we remember Preston Manning's abhorrent election ad campaign which offensively differentiated Québécois from the rest of the country.

We recall the infamous "hula hoop" remark directed by Premier Mike Harris at Ontario's nurses.

We can also point to the constant evasions, dissembling and demagogic ruses of Premier Lucien Bouchard in Quebec.

In many jurisdictions, it seems, Question Period itself is increasingly a forum for ugly theatre, an overloaded, tired vehicle for showmanship, grandstanding and false indignation. Legislators rise from their seats, not to elicit information in the public interest, but to entrap, to embarrass and to ridicule in the partisan interest. Honorable members hector and heckle one another in a manner ill suited for a schoolyard, let alone the legislative assembly or parliament.

What opinion, other than a bellowing game, can the public hold of Question Period? The members themselves treat it as a game, a modern gladiatorial arena where the Opposition tries to "hurt" the government, where one member tries to humiliate another.

Thus, the public has every right to view Question Period dismissively, cynically, as befitting any game that purports to be something far more serious.

Of course, inappropriate behavior by political leaders is not only a Canadian affliction. It can be documented wherever human beings exercise power.

In the United States, effective federal government has all but been suspended as a result of the Starr chamber proceedings there, a coalescence of the president's pathetic libidinous urges, Congressional vendetta plotting and partisanship gone berserk.

In Israel, the situation is even more extreme. Politics has a far harsher edge. Debate in the Knesset is characterized by its lack of civility, constant name-calling and incendiary hot-headedness. It is not a place to bring schoolchildren.

Irrespective of jurisdiction, it is assumed politicians will be expedient and not necessarily always truthful. They tend to be the butt of jokes and generally speaking, do not enjoy a high degree of public trust.

It is an irony and a contradiction that touches the heart of our western way of life.

We tend to revere democracy but revile politicians. One is "holy;" the other profoundly "profane." And yet, in this instance, without the profane, there could be no holy.

Truth to say, it may have always been this way, wherever and whenever a candidate perched on a stump to publicly pitch for votes, wherever and whenever one person was elected to wield power over everyone else, and wherever and whenever an individual refused to yield that power.

This interdependence between the "holy" of democracy and the "profane" of politics creates within us all feelings of civic dissonance that increase or diminish depending upon the inappropriate behavior of the day. But the more accepting we are of that dissonance, the more accepting we will be too of the inappropriate behavior from our political leaders.

And we must never allow that.

The American scholar, Louis Wirth, once noted that democracy is moral before it is political. By that he meant that politics must never be dissociated from morality or ethics or justice or fairness. Though politicians are only human, prone to error and bad judgment, their inappropriate behavior must always be condemned. For the sake of democracy, we must raise our expectations of the standard of behavior of our politicians.

Planning underway to disburse Swiss funds

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Gunther Plaut is urging patience.

"I feel terrible," he admits, "about having to tell someone who's been waiting for 50 years to be patient, but that's the way it is."

Since The CJN reported in its Oct. 15 issue, that Rabbi Plaut has been appointed to head the Canadian committee that will disburse compensation from the humanitarian fund set up by Swiss banks, the rabbi says he's received dozens of inquiries.

"People want to know how to apply, where to get applications, who will get the money. All those questions will be answered. We'll deal with all of them in the fairest manner."

In the meantime, Rabbi Plaut is working to set up a committee of 10 people, comprised mostly of Holocaust survivors, to oversee the task of disbursing the money.

As well, a telephone hotline, like the one assisting survivors in the United States, will likely be set up in Canada.

Last year, Swiss banks established a $185 million (US) humanitarian fund to help needy Holocaust survivors. Roughly $2.5 million was allotted to Canada.

The fund is unrelated to the $1.25 billion settlement reached in August between Swiss banks and claimants to dormant war-era accounts.

Rabbi Plaut was appointed to head the committee in this country by Canadian Jewish Congress, which in turn, was asked by the New York-based Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany to set up a mechanism in Canada.

He says his committee will be "completely independent. It will not be subject to any organizational strictures."

But it will have a daunting task: defining who is needy.

Polls and studies consistently show that in Canada, one out of six Jews lives below the poverty line, and that one-third of all Jewish poor are over 65.

"The needs of people may be more than monetary," he says. "They may also be social or medical."

There are an estimated 18,000 Holocaust survivors in Canada, "but we don't know who is needy. We cannot please 18,000 people if they all apply. But people who feel they are needy will be encouraged to apply."

The committee will be working with local Jewish federations to find out who is deserving of compensation, he added.

"We won't be able to satisfy 18,000 people. But we will try our best."

Toronto day school gets major grant

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto's newest day school, the Downtown Jewish Day School, is one of only eight schools in North America to receive an inaugural challenge grant from the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education.

The grant, which will total $200,000 (US) over the next three years, is intended to help the school achieve excellence by enhancing curriculum, staff and materials. Downtown Jewish Day School must match the amount through its own fundraising efforts.

Dr. Cynthia Lazar, school president, told The CJN that "we are grateful [for the grant] because it allows us to achieve a high level of excellence in secular and Jewish studies. We would like to be able to offer this quality education to children who might not be able to experience it."

Downtown Jewish Day School opened in September with 10 children in senior kindergarten to Grade 2. The hope is to add a grade a year. Temporary quarters are at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

The grant also enables the school to have top-notch staff. "We called on the expertise of Joan Schonfeld, longtime principal of the Downtown Jewish Community School, and Dori Levine, former principal of Shearim Hebrew Day School," Lazar said.

Lazar explained that the matching funds, which must be collected in three annual instalments of $100,000, $60,000 and $40,000, will be raised from private donors.

Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education is a group of Jewish business and philanthropic leaders, including Edgar and Charles Bronfman. Its goal, according to a press release, is to "raise the level of excellence in both Jewish and general studies, while making intellectually exciting education accessible to larger numbers of children."

Another goal is to establish "a network of top new Jewish day schools across North America, [which] will result in the overall enrichment of Jewish life."

Holocaust centre seeking new funds

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre has embarked on a $3-million public fundraising campaign to expand its quarters, and allow it to complete a flurry of ambitious projects.

It's the first time the centre, formerly known as the Holocaust Remembrance Committee, has appealed directly to the public for money. The centre is a UJA beneficiary agency, but receives only about $40,000 a year for its programming budget from the central communal pot.

Currently, the whole operation is squeezed into a small space on the Lipa Green building's fourth floor, displacing the Oscar Schmidt Museum next to the centre's theatre and commemorative hall. Packed bookcases, overflowing boxes, dozens of videos and reams of other material bespeak the need for more space.

Plans call for the centre to take over 900 square feet in the Jewish Public Library across the hall. This new Holocaust Resource Centre will allow officials to properly collect, catalogue and display books, CD-ROMs, films, videos and survivors' testimonies.

The current space will be converted into a multi-purpose room for lectures and meetings. Staff offices will be retained there.

At least $1.5 million will be needed by March to make the new resource complex a reality, says Michael Herman, chair of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre.

And given most survivors' advancing years, now is the time to act, both to preserve their memories in a fitting way, and to ensure that funds are in place, Herman adds.

A special section in the resource centre will house local Holocaust survivors' testimonies, both oral and written.

A proper resource centre, with computers and other technological aids, will permit more students and teachers to better research and study the Holocaust, Herman points out.

"We recognize both the need and potential for education," he told The CJN. "And we're in a position now to tackle new things."

Indeed, the centre has continued with its well-known community programs, like the annual Yom Hashoah service, Holocaust Education Week each autumn, an annual one-day seminar for teachers, speeches by survivors, class visits to the museum and others.

New funds would allow completion of the following projects:

- preserving and cataloguing 400 videotaped survivor testimonies;
- the Continuing Voices program, in which survivors are teamed with young people, who then in turn act as teachers;
- building and updating a Web site, partly to counter Holocaust-denying and hate-related sites;
- filling demand for more teachers' seminars, and lecturing to both student teachers, as well as established teachers.
- distributing educational kits to both students and teachers.

Carole Ann Reed, the centre's recently appointed director of education, also has big plans, among them:

- further dialogue and work with members of Toronto's Rwandan community. About 100 of them are survivors of the 1994 murder of an estimated one million Tutsi and moderate Hutu. They have turned to the Jewish community for advice on how they can memorialize their dead, both in Toronto and Rwanda;
- working toward a curriculum for teaching the Holocaust to public grades 9, 10 and 11. In the meantime, Reed and volunteers from the centre have assembled a 34-page guide on Holocaust-related literature and films and are continually putting together more teaching material;
- proposing that the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) establish a certificate in Holocaust Education, as part of its teacher education program. Reed submitted the idea to OISE last week;
- and working with other agencies to institute support services for survivors, including home visits.

It all represents a quantum leap for the centre, Herman says, and time is short. "We felt that if we wait any longer, we will lose this momentum."

Students get set to honor Anne Frank's memory

TORONTO — In memory of 1½ million children who were victims of the Holocaust, students from Metro Toronto's Brown School and Deerpark Public School will plant a special bed of 800 Anne Frank Tulip Bulbs in a ceremony, Nov. 2 at 1 p.m.

This is the 10th year that special Anne Frank Bulbs have been planted in the Amsterdam Park, Avenue Road and St. Clair.

Assisting the children will be the consul general of the Netherlands, Hendrik Kroon; the consul general of Israel, Jehudi Kinar; members of the provincial legislature; city officials; members of the Jewish and Dutch/Canadian community of Toronto; and members of the Royal Canadian Legion.

This year marks the 50th anniversary of events important to both the Jewish and non-Jewish communities: the founding of the State of Israel; the adoption by the United Nations of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; and the First Assembly of the World Council of Churches in Amsterdam with the adoption of the resolution "To reject anti-Semitism as being incompatible with the Christian faith."

This year, as well, is the 60th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the night of shattered glass, that marked the beginning of the Holocaust.

In preparing the students, special attention has been given to the heroic efforts of the Allied armies in the liberation of Europe, and in particular, the Canadian armies who liberated Holland. They were one month too late for Anne Frank, who died in the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, but a few attending the planting will remember those soldiers and will never forget their sacrifice.

The event is co-sponsored by the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation and the Dutch/Canadian Association of Greater Toronto.

Transnistria survivors remember Romanian Jews

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Transnistria survivors and their families gathered recently at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue to commemorate the decimation of Romanian Jewry during World War II.

The program, which marked the 57th anniversary of the deportation of 300,000 Romanian Jews to Transnistria, was organized by the Transnistria Survivors' Association of Toronto. Israeli consul Irit Waidergorn was among the more than 80 people who attended.

"We are here to remember our loved ones," association secretary-treasurer Arnold Buxbaum, told the group assembled in the chapel.

More than two-thirds of Transnistria Jews perished during the death marches or as a result of the harsh conditions in the camps in Transnistria, the area of Ukraine bounded by the Dnestr and Bug rivers, Etty Zigler, vice-president of the Transnistria Survivors' Association said.

A memorial service led by Herman Rubinger included commemorative candlelighting by the children and grandchildren of the Transnistria survivors.

The keynote speaker, Howard Driman, chair of Holocaust Education Week, spoke about the week's events and the work of the Holocaust Centre.

Transnistria Survivors' Association co-founder Freda Rosenblat, spoke about her own deportation in 1941, and her subsequent survival as an orphan at the age of 10.

Originally from Bessarabia, now a part of the Republic of Moldova, Rosenblat, her brother and parents were among the thousands of Jews forced to march to Transnistria. There was often little food or water for days, she recalled. "People were dropping dead from exhaustion."

Rosenblat noted that Romanian gendarmes, who were allies of the Nazis, led the death marches to Transnistria. "Those alive marched again and again. The gendarmes said they were going to make our lives so miserable that we would be happy to die. They didn't want to waste bullets on us."

Rosenblat and her family stayed in Bershad, a camp in Transnistria, where she said 200 people a day perished from cold, hunger and disease. Among them were her parents who died within three weeks of each other.

Zigler announced that the Holocaust Museum in Washington has put up a wall for the Transnistria camps in the Hall of Remembrance. The hall will be officially inaugurated in the spring.

She also spoke of recent developments in Moldova and Transnistria, and read from a report compiled by Raphael Vago, a Transnistria survivor and professor at the University of Tel Aviv.

Vago said he met a small group of survivors in Moldova who were dedicated to preserving the memory of the Jewish victims of Transnistria. A few thousand Jews reside in Transnistria, and they too are determined to keep the memory of the Holocaust alive among local inhabitants, he said.

The post-war generation has erected a memorial in Dupasari, the burial site of 18,000 Transnistria Jews, many of whom are identified by name. Unidentified skeletons recently discovered along the banks of the Dnestr River were recently reburied in a special ceremony at the Dupasari memorial, he noted.

Zigler was heartened by the news of those communities' efforts because the association had wanted to build a memorial in Transnistria, she said. "Now that we have heard that a memorial is already in place, we will get in touch with these people to be of some help."

Other participants in the program included association president Osias Nadel, Dvora Gluck, Gine Rubinger, and Naomi and Joanna Gryfe.

After the summit

After nine days of exhausting negotiation in a secluded, sylvan setting along the Wye River in Maryland, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Chairman Yasser Arafat signed a memorandum of agreement that reinvigorates the fragile peace process.

Though there are a number of new elements in the agreement, it mostly enshrines what was already agreed to at an earlier stage in the peace process. Israel received more promises and more signed commitments from the Palestinian Authority (PA) aimed at enhancing Israel's security. The PA received more promises and more signed commitments from Israel aimed at enhancing Palestinian territory. But the signing of the memorandum by Netanyahu and Arafat, in the presence of U.S. President Bill Clinton and Jordan's King Hussein, and before an international television audience, was indeed an important step on the long road to peaceful coexistence between the two peoples.

But even as Netanyahu and Arafat look to the next round of talks, they must guard themselves and the peace process against extremists and terrorists on both sides. We therefore feel compelled to address our co-religionists. We urge every rabbi with a pulpit, every rabbi with a following and every rosh yeshiva in the Diaspora and in Israel to denounce unequivocally, in the harshest terms, the use of violence by anyone intent on bringing down either the agreement or the government of Israel.

A great Canadian

Brian Dickson was a great Canadian. The former chief justice of the Supreme Court served his country and its diverse people during his entire adult life. With courage, commitment, determination and sacrifice, he strove constantly forward, always seeking to advance the one overarching cause to which he dedicated his life: the well-being of his fellow human being.

He was a soldier, a jurist, a judge, a humanitarian and simply, an outstanding human being. He was also a pioneer of sorts, steering Canadian jurisprudence through the then-uncharted waters of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. His landmark judgments in those early days taught us all that the Charter was not an unruly ocean to be feared. Rather, it was a body of sweet water to be sailed enthusiastically, thoughtfully and compassionately, a spring of life that would forever help sustain and continually nourish the evolving, uniquely Canadian democracy.

Justice Dickson spoke for the majority of the Supreme Court almost a decade ago in December 1990, when it overturned the Alberta Court of Appeal's dismissal of the case against James Keegstra.

"The suppression of hate propaganda undeniably muzzles participation of a few individuals in the democratic process, and hence detracts somewhat from free expression values, but the degree of this limitation is not substantial. I am aware that the use of strong language in political and social debate – indeed, perhaps even language intended to promote hatred – is an unavoidable part of the democratic process. Moreover, I recognize that hate propaganda is expression of a type which would generally be categorized as 'political,' thus putatively placing it at the very heart of the principle extolling freedom of expression as vital to the democratic process. Nonetheless, expression can work to undermine our commitment to democracy where employed to propagate ideas anathemic to democratic values. Hate propaganda works in just such a way, arguing as it does for a society in which the democratic process is subverted and individuals are denied respect and dignity simply because of racial or religious characteristics. This brand of expressive activity is thus wholly inimical to the democratic aspirations of the free expression guarantee."

Justice Brian Dickson died Oct. 17, 1998. He was 82.

His example, his legacy and his memory will be for blessing.

Dreyfus kin died at Auschwitz

Re: The letter by Linda R. Goldman (CJN, Oct. 8) regarding the fate of a member of the Dreyfus family.

Madeleine Levy was the granddaughter of Alfred Dreyfus and his wife Louise Hadamand. Her mother was Jeanne, and her father, Pierre Paul Levy. As a young girl she had been a girl scout, and as a young woman, a social worker. When France was invaded, she joined the Resistance and also worked with the Red Cross. A collaborationist tract in Toulouse spoke of her as the "Jewess who dared not speak her name," and ended its diatribe with, "Sweep her out!"

Although the Levys had been warned of a crackdown and had fled from Toulouse, Madeleine had returned to the city to work and to pack provisions for her family. While at the family's apartment, she was arrested and sent to Drancy. In 1943, she was put on Convoy No. 62, along with 83 children whom she helped care for "with forced gaiety." On her arrival at Auschwitz, Madeleine was assigned to a work group, laboring at an excavation near Birkenau, but she soon fell ill with typhus. When she died in January 1944, she weighed less than 70 pounds.

Churches should campaign against Protocols

After reading "An anti-Semitic lie that wouldn't die" (CJN, Sept. 17), a compelling thought propelled me to respond.

Why not ask the churches to start a united campaign against the existence of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion?

Let us not repeat the reluctance of the Jews in Germany as well as the Jews worldwide to act before Hitler became powerful.

Ontario is spending millions of dollars on anti-racism programs that are not making much of an impact. In this enlightened era, if the churches invited Righteous Gentiles and honored them for saving Jews, they would attract membership.

We have every right to expect the Christian community to join us in protests against the Protocols being published.

How can we remain silent about the teaching of anti-Semitism?

It is time Christianity opened its heart to our continued fear of anti-Semitism.

Palestinian TV blamed for war cartoons

Re: "Palestinian kids' show calls for a holy war" (CJN, Sept. 24).

It is impossible not to be discouraged and angry when Palestinian television, through cartoon characters, continues to encourage children to wage a holy war against Israel. These cartoons are not only a cruel caricature of the peace process, but also a clear violation of the Oslo accords. And the problem is not only with cartoons. Palestinian television in general does precious little to foster mutual understanding and tolerance with Israelis. Yasser Arafat, when recently challenged about this, promised to correct the situation, and only time will tell if he actually does something about it.

Nothing new in letter opposing Peace Now

Re: "Criticizes Peace Now position on Arafat," letter to the editor (CJN, Sept. 17).

Michael M. Salamon's letter criticizing Peace Now may have been misleading. He criticizes a previous Canadian Friends of Peace Now letter which presented Israeli-based evidence that it was a radical Palestinian fringe group – not Arafat's Fatah movement – that posted on a Web site a new constitution calling for Israel's destruction.

Salamon presents absolutely no evidence to the contrary and then says that, regardless of who did what, Arafat should have condemned whoever did it. But the Peace Now letter also said that; and in the pages of The CJN, Canadian Friends of Peace Now has not been at all shy about criticizing Arafat. So, other than Salamon not liking Peace Now, I can't see what the fuss is all about.

Opposes segregation of male and female at Kotel

O, the irony! As Rabbi Avi Shafran railed against offering the non-Orthodox a section of the Kotel for their own mixed gender prayer "The Balkanization of the Western Wall," (CJN, Sept. 10), the same issue noted: Orthodox men have reacted with violence, throwing chairs at women who were praying at the Wailing Wall for the (presumably) inexcusable offence of gathering and thereby imitating a minyan (Women of the Wall borrow Lubavitch tactic, CJN, Sept. 10).

I am shocked at the Rabbi's sanctimony. On the one hand, he rails against allowing a "balkanized" Kotel, while on the other he defends the Orthodox segregation of male and female. While many Jewish groups see the need for Jewish inclusion and tolerance, other groups prefer to retain existing internal divisions and the traditional imposition of one group's will over the remainder.

Politics among the Palestinians

On the day of Yasser Arafat's departure for Wye Plantation, Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin sent him a personal letter.

"My brother, President Abu Amar," wrote Yassin. "Rumors have been spreading recently that Hamas wants to assassinate members of the [Palestinian] national leadership, and you in particular.

"I wish to inform you that this rumor campaign is being orchestrated by agents of the Israeli enemy who seek to destroy Palestinian unity by instigating and sowing strife."

Relations between Hamas and the Palestinian Authority, including the personal relationship of Arafat and Sheikh Yassin, have seriously deteriorated in the past year.

When Sheikh Yassin was in prison, and when he was freed a year ago, Arafat treated the Hamas leader with great respect. Following his release, the Sheikh toured Arab capitals, and was given a king's welcome, arousing Arafat's jealousy. During his visits to the Arab capitals, the Sheikh made disparaging comments about the Palestinian leadership.

Arafat has not called or met with the Sheikh since he returned to Gaza. Relations fell apart more than six months ago, following the incident in which Hamas activist Muhi a-Din Sharif was killed in Ramallah. The Palestinian Authority announcement that Sharif was killed by fellow Hamas members angered Islamic fundamentalist leaders. Two Hamas leaders, Dr. Abdel Aziz Rantisi and Dr. Ibrahim Maqadmeh, were arrested by Arafat's people and have been in jail ever since. They are not alone.

Dozens more (some say more than 100) Hamas activists have been put in Palestinian prisons without trials. They were recently joined by a group of young men – some belonging to the cell that tried to smuggle more than 30 kilograms of incendiary material out of Gaza – who were planning terrorist attacks against Israel when they were arrested by the Palestinian security service, and by the Hebron chemist and his friends who set up an explosives laboratory in the city.

Another 20 Hamas activists, suspected of assisting terrorist Salam Sarsour who carried out the recent grenade attack at the central bus station in Beersheva, were just arrested in Hebron.

Sarsour also murdered Shlomo Raanan in Tel Rumeida, and lobbed grenades at IDF soldiers on Hebron's Shuhada Street on Yom Kippur.

The Hamas ranks are seething with anger at Arafat and his men for pursuing the Islamic fundamentalists. Nevertheless, the most striking thing about Hamas statements, including Sheikh Yassin's letter to Arafat, is the care with which they refrain from showing disrespect to the Palestinian Authority and its leader.

Hamas' recent terrorist activities should be examined with this in mind.

The timing of the grenade attack in Beersheva, like that of most Hamas terror attacks in the 10 years of its existence, is not tied to political developments in the peace process.

In other words, Sarsour did not throw the grenades in Beersheva specifically to sabotage the negotiations at Wye Plantation. Past Hamas attacks have been equally difficult to connect directly with political discussions. Moreover, Hamas attacks are often in complete opposition to Palestinian political interests.

This week, the Palestinians were about to receive another 13 percent of the West Bank. Why didn't the Beersheva terrorist wait a few weeks until this additional territory was under Palestinian control?

Hamas' capacity for attacks would then be multiplied, since the second redeployment would add to the territory currently under Palestinian rule, the territory that Hamas uses as "cities of refuge for terrorists." Why shouldn't Hamas restrain itself for a few weeks?

Palestinian Authority security chief Jibril Rajoub said scornfully recently that the Beersheva attack was basically a gift to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu who was impatiently awaiting a Hamas attack in order to justify his own recalcitrant position.

Other Palestinian leaders emphasized the fact that the terrorist had ties to the Israeli Shin Bet – making him a sort of Palestinian Avishai Raviv – and claimed that his deeds could have been an Israeli orchestrated provocation.

Palestinian leaders, as well as most Israeli defence experts who deal with the issue, have concluded that the military wing of Hamas hardly ever takes political factors into account. Hamas opposes political negotiations and the peace process, but its people act according to considerations independent of the timetable of the peace process.

It appears that internal Palestinian politics are the central element driving Hamas activities. Hamas has a very well-defined platform. It is an ideological movement, with ambitions to replace the PLO as the leader of the Palestinian people. Hamas leaders know that their chances of taking control tomorrow are very slim; therefore, they need to concentrate today on educational and training projects, and otherwise gaining public admiration and support. The terror attacks are part of this program.

Their methods have changed over the years. In the period between the 1991 Madrid conference and the massacre carried out by Baruch Goldstein at Hebron's Tomb of the Patriarchs, Hamas made it known that its people were concentrating on aiming their attacks against IDF soldiers, and refraining from attacking civilians. Those were the days of kidnappings of soldiers and frontier policemen and attacks on Shin Bet agents. After the Goldstein massacre, Hamas announced that it would now attack civilians.

The mass terror attacks carried out by Hamas drew criticism from the Palestinian public, and somewhat weakened the movement's standing. Several times in the past year, Hamas spokespeople have announced that the organization was about to stage revenge attacks against Israel (following the Khaled Meshal episode in Jordan, the death of Muhi a-Din Sharif in Ramallah and the killing of the Awadallah brothers near Hebron), but the threats were not carried out – apparently because Hamas is incapable of acting on them.

In the past two years, Palestinian and Israeli security services have succeeded in infiltrating Hamas' military wing and foiling plans for attacks. Perhaps it is no coincidence that lately there have been no major suicide attacks.

Instead, there have been more limited operations such as the planting of small bombs (on Tel Aviv's Allenby Street and at Mount Scopus in Jerusalem), shootings of settlers (in Yitzhar and Hebron), and the actions carried out by Sarsour.

However, predictions of Hamas' future should not be based on this. The more gloomy, hostile and fearful the atmosphere becomes among the Palestinian public, the more enthusiasm and anticipation there is for violent Hamas actions. In such an atmosphere, Hamas will certainly continue to act.

Apples on the family tree

For the past several years, my cousins and I have been working on our family tree. Unfortunately, we did not think about this when my parents, the ones most familiar with family antecedents, were living, but we have been fortunate in having one family member left who could give us names and some details for at least one branch of the tree.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

It is always risky to research your roots – you may find out things you didn't need to know. It may be romantic to have an ancestor who was a madam or a horse-thief, but who wants a close relative who was a "lady of the night" or a felon?

One branch of the family was already resident in Pennsylvania before the American Revolution. From Germany they crossed the ocean and took up farming in the tolerant state of William Penn, a Quaker who welcomed all to his "sylvania."

On the other side, family tradition held that the family was of Hessian stock, the Hessians being the mercenaries hired by George III to fight his colonial war. Captured by George Washington and his raggle-taggle troops, the Hessians were in no hurry to return to their brutal existence in Germany; so they blended into the existing German-American farming communities.

Supposedly one ancestor, Col. Lindenmuth, fought with Washington, possibly capturing his future in-laws. Anyway, it makes a great story, and we are slowly working our way back to see if we can substantiate any of it.

Meanwhile, on my husband's side, the Gerber family, another cousin has begun the more laborious task of tracing the European roots.

What brings me to this family history? It is the season of Torah readings which begin the story of the family of humankind. God, first of all, tries to convince His newly created couple to obey Him. Failing that, He tries for the next generation, and the next, until, fed up with the lot, He sweeps all but one family away and starts over. Finally He focuses on one family – the family of Abram and Sarai, soon to become Abraham and Sarah.

Every year when we read this cycle, beginning with Adam and Eve and ending with the children of Jacob transformed into the nation of Israel, we have a chance to see the incredible power of family in all its splendor and searching, as well as its anger, hatred, bitterness and deceit.

Read literally, these master stories tell us that the first families were just like ours only more so. They too struggled with sibling rivalry, a struggle made more deadly by the lack of understanding of death and the sin of murder. They suffered the effects of jealousy, parental favoritism and arrogance.

Some readings try to remove the obvious failings of the patriarchs.

Abraham's attempt to use Sarah as protection is excused; Jacob's tricking of Esau is permitted in order to correct Isaac's blindness towards Esau's unfitness. But this reading removes the human-ness of our ancestors.

Their behavior is described, both good and bad. These are not supermen and women, but exceptional mortals chosen to perform a task they can only dimly understand – the task of bringing to the human race the idea of a moral society and a spiritual realm that seeks justice on earth. That's a pretty tall order, and it should be no surprise that these families make a lot of mistakes on the way. We read these family stories with relish every year because they give us hope that we can learn from their mistakes, as much from their good deeds and piety as from their failures and their successes.

And that is just how we conduct our family lives, sometimes making a wise comment on life, offering good advice to our children and providing them with an ethical role model. Other times we teach them our prejudices and exhibit our worst traits. The Jewish people is fortunate to have such a family tree. It gives us hope that our own contributions to family and community will make a difference for our descendants.

Random thoughts from High Holy Days

I love the High Holy Days. For me, it is a time for serious reflection and introspection. For at least three days a year, I can put aside the Constitution and the criminal law and concentrate, instead, on matters of religious commitment and spiritual fulfilment.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

When I listen to the Cantor chant the U'netane Tokef, my mind is freed from problems of the Notwithstanding Clause. When I pound on my chest while reciting the Al Chayt, I can forget about the inadequacies of the criminal justice system. It is a time of repentance and a time to rededicate myself to the performance of mitzvot.

However, just prior to Rosh Hashanah, I read an article entitled Does Conservative Judaism Have a Future? It was in the September 1998 issue of the neo-conservative magazine, Commentary, written by Reform Rabbi Clifford E. Librach of Sharon, Mass. I began to reflect upon the present state of the Conservative movement, my own Conservative congregation and my place within this particular stream of Jewish thought and practice. Indeed, as my friends noted with some impatience, I became obsessed by these issues.

In the article, Rabbi Librach notes that "until very recently, most American Jews affiliated with synagogues have... found their home in this [Conservative] movement... which locates itself between the 'extremes' of Reform to its left and Orthodoxy to its right." Rabbi Librach states, however, that "now the movement is in trouble" because it is losing members to Reform Judaism ("an attractive and demographically bulging way-station for Conservative Jews on the way to religious oblivion") and to Orthodoxy ("a counter-cultural stay against the moral and spiritual anomie of post-modern America"). Pretty strong language and perhaps even true, but not in Edmonton and not at my shul. Let me explain.

Three years ago, after a period of intense acrimony, my synagogue, Congregation Beth Shalom of Edmonton, and its rabbi parted company. Some of the rabbi's supporters also left the congregation in sympathy with the rabbi. Thus far, this is not a particularly novel story. What is interesting, however, is that the congregation has been without a rabbi ever since. Nor are there any prospects on the horizon.

What is more intriguing yet, is that, after the initial loss of members due to the split, the membership of the congregation has, against all logic, showed significant growth. (Incidentally, the growth in membership is not attributable to the return of the dissidents; they continue to support the congregation they founded at the time of the split.) New members have come from other shuls where there are rabbis, or from the ranks of the previously unaffiliated. The moral of this story: it takes a very good rabbi to be better than no rabbi at all.

The truth is that there is almost no activity or event in congregational life for which you actually require a rabbi. Rabbis are not necessary for the minyan or davening, for Torah reading or chanting the megillot, for b'nei mitzvot or weddings or funerals. And they certainly aren't necessary to recite Hamotzi at congregational dinners. Laypersons can learn to do all of this. And we have terrifically talented and committed lay ritual leaders who lead the congregation on these public occasions. And after all, this is all to the good. Rabbis are not even needed for delivering divrei Torah. With just a click of the mouse, a congregation can be treated to words and thoughts of rabbis Schorsch or Riskin or whoever. With a committed and cooperative chavurah you can even learn Torah from the great rabbis this way. This, too, is good.

But there is a dark side to not having a rabbi. Put succinctly, without a rabbi, the congregation has no legal, moral or ethical leadership. Everything is "OK" because there is no one with authority to say otherwise. (And in the Conservative movement, with its wide variance in practice and belief among member congregations, it probably is "OK" in some rabbi's view.) In a relatively short time, this results in a lowering of the standards of Jewish practice of the congregation, both individually and collectively. Everything is too comfortable and too serene and everyone is too complacent. There is no one who can impress upon young people the importance of coming to shul after bar or bat mitzvah. There is no one to point out that, as important as it might be to honor the departed at Yizkor on Yom Kippur, it is also vital to rejoice with your children on Simchat Torah and Purim. Without a rabbi, there is no one dedicated to promoting kashrut or the observance of the Sabbath.

This year, many of our university and high school students were not in shul for Rosh Hashanah or even Yom Kippur. Nor did people seem particularly astonished by this. For the three most important days in the Jewish year, high school students could not miss classes. The idea is absurd! I recalled growing up in Sydney, N.S. When I was in Grade 10 or 11, a history final exam was scheduled for Shavuot. We were in quandary as to what to do. Our rabbi, Israel Kenner, of blessed memory, had no doubt about what he should do. He told the students and our parents that we would not be going to school on Shavuot, and he advised the principal of school that none of "his children" would write that exam and that the school had better figure out a way to give us a final grade without penalty for missing that exam. The students listened, the parents listened and the school principal listened. And that is why congregations need rabbis.

Communism and the Jews

From time to time, I have the opportunity to read one of the best newspapers in existence, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, often called the New York Times of Germany. Like the latter, it has the largest amount of reportage on Jewish matters of any other similar publication, and in depth frequently is far ahead of the New York paper.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The latest article that attracted me was published in August and was intriguingly headlined "Socialist Aryanization." Aryan was the term by which the Nazis defined their racial Germanness, primarily in contradistinction to Jews. Aryanization was the process by which the government acquired Jewish property under the guise of racial policy.

The article in the Allgemeine covers a related subject – how the Communist government of the former German Democratic Republic dealt with its small Jewish community. As is well known to anybody who bothers to remember those bygone days, the DDR (as that Communist state was called) was, like its model, violently anti-Israel and at the same time, it pretended to pursue a scrupulously equal treatment of its Jewish population. (Soviet Russia made the same declaration, while being viciously anti-Semitic.)

The German Communists managed to suppress any religious revitalization amongst its Jews, something they failed to achieve with the Christian churches. I remember meeting one or two of the rather pathetic individuals who called themselves "Jewish leaders," whose activity consisted primarily in doing the will of the government. I also remember how, on a visit to the person who described himself as the "chief rabbi of Berlin," I found no Jewish library in his home, except a single folio of a Talmud tractate that he had upside down in front of him. Everything was clearly fake from beginning to end.

Not surprisingly, the state secretary for religious matters was able to declare in 1982 that Judaism in the DDR was henceforth to be treated in the same manner as a museum.

At one point, East Germany's Soviet leader, Erich Honecker, wanted the support of the United States, while at the same time telling his countrymen that the Jews controlled America. When he thought he had some hope of getting financial aid, he made quick adjustments vis-a-vis his own Jewish community: The planned highway through the Jewish cemetery of Berlin-Weissensee was cancelled and he invited members of the World Jewish Congress to meet in the city. The DDR was in every respect a phony – from the drug-enhanced athletes it sent to the Olympics to its Jewish policy.

I am glad to say that today the east Germans have made a serious attempt to repair this aspect of their past, and they have done a better job with it than with their economic integration into the new United Germany. Maybe the almost total absence of a Jewish component in their economic structure is a factor contributing to this failure.

The Kirshner File

The role of Yiddish theatre in Jewish culture

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Yiddish theatre, like Yiddish itself, is on the precipice, teetering on the edge of extinction. Its demise, if you'll pardon an undertatement, would be a great pity.

Just how important a component of Ashkenazi Jewish culture it has been is suggested by Nahma Sandrow in Vagabond Stars: A World History of Yiddish Theatre (Syracuse University Press), the most comprehensive book in English on the topic I have ever read.

In her sweeping survey, Sandrow misses exceedingly little. From Avrom Goldfadn, the father of the Yiddish theatre, to Ida Kaminska, one of its finest actors, Sandrow bears down on the fundamentals with the intensity of a laser beam. Yet no one is perfect. She dismisses Dora Wasserman, Montreal's grande dame of the Yiddish theatre, in one desultory paragraph at the end of her 400-page plus opus.

Still, aficionados of Yiddish will generally be pleased with this volume, enhanced by 125 illustrations, somewhat grainy though they may be.

Goldfadn, a failed teacher, businessman, medical student and newspaper editor, is the first in a long line of worthies she examines. Explaining why Yiddish theatre took shape under his guidance in the last quarter of the 19th century, Sandrow contends that Goldfadn was the ideal person to make it work.

A folk singer and poet, he was a trouper, an artist, a dreamer, an intellectual and, yes, a hustler. Certainly, she has no illusions about him. Goldfadn's plays cannot be described as profound literature, yet they are touching, lyrical and comical and accurately reflect the times. In short, Goldfadn created a corpus of plays and songs that today are the staple repertory of every Yiddish company, songfest or recital.

Sandrow's appraisal of Sholom Asch – the first Yiddish dramatist whose plays had an impact outside the Jewish world – is apt. And her assessment of Jacob Gordin, whose dramas transformed the Yiddish theatre, is right on the mark.

Sandrow's succinct profiles are integral to her narrative, but Vagabond Stars really shines with its analysis of Yiddish theatre in the farflung countries where it thrived, albeit under occasional duress.

Let's begin with Russia, which had the largest concentration of Jews in the 19th century. As part of its suppression of the Jewish population, the reactionary Russian government banned Yiddish theatre in 1883, only two years after the first big wave of pogroms. It was a cruel blow, but not a fatal one. The Yiddish theatre muddled through the crisis by renaming itself "German theatre." Conditions eased in 1908 and deteriorated once again in 1910. But by 1913, the situation had stabilized.

Under the sway of communism, in the Soviet Union, Yiddish theatre led a checkered existence. For ideological reasons, the Bolsheviks subsidized many Yiddish theatres. By the mid-1930s, the Soviet Union had 20 such theatres. Yet the idyll was fleeting. In the late 1940s, amid a climate of rising anti-Semitism, the illustrious actor/director Solomon Mikhoels was murdered, the last Yiddish newspaper was closed, the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee was disbanded, and the Yiddish theatre lost its state subsidy.

After Joseph Stalin's death, there was a thaw, and the Moscow Dramatic Yiddish Concert Ensemble surfaced. With the onset of the 1960s and 1970s, the status of Yiddish theatre slipped yet again. In the late 1980s, as glasnost took hold, there was a revival. In the post-Soviet period, emigration and economic pressures have made it harder to support Yiddish culture.

No discussion of Yiddish theatre would be complete without references to Vilna and Warsaw. In this respect, Sandrow is in fine form. She discusses the role of the fabled Vilna Troupe, as well as the contributions of a group of up-and-coming writers known as Young Vilna, many of whose leading figures perished during the Holocaust.

Dora Wasserman

Turning to Warsaw, whose interwar atmosphere she adjudges to be more sophisticated and worldly than that of Vilna, Sandrow launches into an analysis of Yiddish theatre in Poland and, more specifically, of the Kaminska family's impact on it.

Her evaluation of the theatrical scene in Poland in the aftermath of World War II is as rigorous. Amidst the ruins, seasoned troupers like Zygmund Turkow, Dina Blumenfeld and Shimen Dzigan drifted back to their old haunts in Warsaw and Lodz, if only temporarily, and the Yiddish State Theatre emerged.

But, as Sandrow reminds us, the renaissance was of brief duration, being overtaken by emigration.

Interestingly enough, the flame of Yiddish theatre flickered during the darkest of moments. The actor Moshe Potashinsky, a Vilna Troupe veteran, recited fragments from Tevye the Dairyman in Auschwitz. And in the camps of Transnistria, Romanian Jews, drawing on their rich heritage, were occasionally able to put on plays and evenings of folk songs and poetry.

In the pantheon of Yiddish theatre, the United States looms large. New York City's Lower East Side developed into one of its centres, and Boris Thomashefsky, a cigarette maker from Poland with huge ambitions, became one of its exemplars.

Sandrow also devotes considerable space to another seminal figure, Maurice Schwartz, the man behind the Yiddish Art Theatre on Second Avenue, which lasted from 1918 to 1950.

Praised by The New York Times' legendary drama critic, Brooks Atkinson, the Yiddish Art Theatre presented such classics as Goldfadn's The Two Kuni-Lemls, Gordin's Mirele Efros and Yitshok Leyb Peretz's The Golden Chain. In Sandrow's judgment, its single greatest success was Yoshe Kalb, dramatized from the novel by none other than Isaac Bashevis Singer.

Not without justification, she claims that New York City has become the mecca of professional Yiddish theatre. In recent years, she points out, favorites like Shalom Aleichem's Hard to Be a Jew and S. Anski's The Dybbuk have been staged.

Sandrow is blunt about the place of Yiddish theatre in Israel. "[It] did not find a homeland in Israel," she writes with a certain finality.

During the British mandate, Yiddish theatres sprung up in Haifa, Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and Rishon Le Zion. But ideologically, Yiddish was always controversial in Palestine. Can you believe that the Hebrew University turned down a proposal for a department of Yiddish literature? It happened, in 1931.

With the influx of Romanian, Polish and Russian Jews, Yiddish gained a measure of respectability in Israel. The Hebrew University sanctioned the establishment of a department of Yiddish studies. Then, in short order, the Israeli government lowered the prohibitively high tax rate squeezing Yiddish theatres and belatedly took steps to fund a National Yiddish Theatre.

In passing, Sandrow glosses over the Yiddish theatre scene in Argentina, Britain and Canada.

A lurid element sets Argentina immediately apart from any other country. There, amazingly enough, Jewish white slavers maintained a network of theatres, synagogues and cemeteries. London, in the 1880s, attracted some of the finest Yiddish thespians.

As I have already noted, Montreal is given short shrift, while Toronto is not even mentioned. It would be good and proper if Sandrow remedies these glaring omissions in the next edition of Vagabond Stars.

Rabbinic Reflections

We must learn how to perfect one's midot

By RABBI ELIE KARFUNKEL

Being the rabbi in Oshawa, I am given the opportunity to reach out to the community on many different levels. Although I enjoy all aspects of my responsibilities, the true highlight of my week is being a part of the teaching staff at the Hebrew school.

Each year in the school, I try to emphasize an area where I hope to achieve the most development from the students. This year, the emphasis is on how the class acts during their recess time. After all, what's the point of having them sit in the classroom learning about Jewish traditions if 10 minutes later a classmate gets berated for not throwing a ball through a hoop. The hope is that the attitudes learned on the court will be carried over to every aspect of the students' lives.

The first Rashi in the Torah asks the following question: If the Torah is principally a book of mitzvot, then why doesn't it begin with Shemot (Exodus), where the first mitzvah given to Israel is mentioned? Rashi answers that if the nations of the world should say that the land of Israel does not belong to the Jewish people, we can respond that HaShem is the creator of the world and He has granted the land to us. Bereshit, therefore, is the proof of our right to the land.

Land granted to us

The Slonomer Rebbe points out that this explanation is correct, but it leads to a further question. It is quite understandable that Bereshit is mentioned first to support a claim to the land. However, why doesn't the Torah then continue with the first mitzvah that Israel was commanded to perform? Before this mitzvah is even mentioned, the lives of our forefathers are outlined in the rest of Bereshit. Why is this necessary?

The Slonomer Rebbe answers that the Torah mentions these episodes for a very fundamental reason. Before one can even think about performing the mitzvot, one must learn how to perfect one's midot (character traits). This we can learn from our great patriarchs and matriarchs. Only once we have studied the lives of our role models and internalized their messages, can we truly keep the mitzvot. The lesson of the entire book of Bereshit is that becoming a mentsch is a prerequisite to the fulfilment of the mitzvot.

Many times teachers meet parents who inquire about their children. They ask about their child's behavior in the classroom. Are they neat and orderly, respectful to the teacher and other students, and conscientious in their schoolwork? While all these questions are important, they are still secondary to what must be our ultimate concern. When our children are out of the classroom, when there is little or no adult supervision, how do they act toward their peers? Are they really learning the lesson in Bereshit?

The Jewish Highway

Welcoming a baby girl

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Mazel Tov. It's a girl.

Last week, we looked at some of the online resources for a brit milah.

The birth of a girl or a boy are both wonderful simchot, which are marked by different religious observances. A boy will have a brit milah, perhaps preceded by the shalom zachar (welcome to the baby boy), a party held on the first Friday evening after the birth [http://www.shemayisrael.co.il/childrens/zachor/index.htm].

But what about the girls? Traditionally, the baby girl is named on the next day that the Torah is read. The father is called to the Torah, and special prayers and blessings are recited on behalf of the mother and the newborn baby. At that point, the baby's name is formally announced [http://www.emoil.com/girl.htm]. An essay at Circumcision.net suggests that there isn't a corresponding ceremony to the brit milah for girls, because "the female gives expression to this spiritual covenant through a lifetime commitment to the Torah laws governing family purity...Moreover, all privileges connected to this covenant accrue to the girl from the moment she is born" [http://www.circumcision.net/FAQ.htm].

However, in recent years, many parents have felt a need to hold more elaborate ceremonies welcoming their Jewish daughters into the world.

Today, a look at some of the ceremonies on the Jewish Highway.

These baby-naming ceremonies may be called brit bat, brit banot Yisrael, simchat bat or seder zeved habat, the Sephardi naming ritual for girls.

For a very good overview of their evolution, take a look at B'nai Brith's Jewish Monthly Online's Thank Heaven for Little Girls: Finally, a Wholehearted Welcome for Half the Jewish People [http://bnaibrith.org/ijm/articles/thnkhvn/index.html]. The article suggests that " there are no prohibitions to prevent religiously observant parents from honoring the birth of a girl baby. Thus, this fledgling ceremony has taken its first tentative steps into Jewish households across the religious spectrum... Some read a loving note to their newborn or give her a gift of a kiddush cup or Shabbat candlesticks.

"David and Leslie Mirchin of Cambridge, Mass. taught those assembled at their simchat bat the Hebrew song El HaMaayan – to the fountain of water – in honor of their own new fountain of joy, Maayan Levy Mirchin."

Greg and Carolyn Priest-Dorman of Poughkeepsie, N.Y., wanted to create their own ceremony for the birth of Leora Rose [http://www.cs.vassar.edu/~priestdo/ZevedHaBat.html]. But instead of creating a brand new ceremony, they decided to adapt the Sephardi seder zeved habat (gift of a daughter), which "expressed the sense of joy and wonder we felt at being parents of a girl-child." They timed their ceremony to coincide with the Birkat HaLevanah, the blessing preceding the appearance of the New Moon, which they "felt achieved the perfect balance of traditional Jewish ritual with the almost universal human equation of women and the cycles of the moon."

Tova Gabrielle Wilensky was born at 12:51 p.m. on Thursday, April 30, 1998, on Israel's 50th birthday. A month later, her family celebrated Tova's arrival [http://www.clarityconnect.com/webpages/wilensky/naming.htm]. The ceremony concluded with the hopes that all Jewish parents could echo:

"We dedicate our child to Torah, to a never-ending fascination with study and learning. With a book, she will never be alone. We dedicate our child to chupah, to never-ending growth as a human being capable of giving and receiving love. With a loving friend, she will never be alone. We dedicate our child to ma'asim tovim, to a never-ending concern for family and community, justice and charity. If she cares for others, she will never be alone."

Next week, Jewish traditions on what to name the baby.

An upside down Simchat Torah

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

It took a rabbinic conference to turn my world upside down.

At a Leadership Education and Development conference last year, I got this upside down idea. I was speaking with my friend Yaakov Schwartz, rabbi of the Young Israel of Oceanside, N.Y. , who told me about a Simchat Torah program he had organized there.

On the evening of Simchat Torah, all the synagogues in the area, Reform, Conservative and Orthodox, join together in the streets for the final hakafah. Rabbi Schwartz spoke with enormous enthusiasm about this, and encouraged me to try doing it in Montreal. I was inspired by his vision of all Jews celebrating the Torah together, but wondered if it would work in Montreal.

After I returned home, I mentioned the idea to several colleagues, and Rabbi Lionel Moses and Rabbi Ron Aigen both embraced the idea enthusiastically.

Several planning meetings were held, and eventually, the Simchat Torah event included seven area synagogues: Adath Israel, Chevra Kadisha, Dorshei Emet, Or Hahayim, Shaare Zion, Spanish and Portuguese and Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem. The synagogues would march with a police escort, meeting each other along the way, proceeding to Baily Road, where, at 9 p.m., the outdoor hakafah would take place. Technical details such as time, marching routes, outdoor lighting and refreshments were attended to; we could only pray that the weather would be clear.

The biggest question was attendance. Did we really believe people would come? What if only a small group came? The fear was that if the event was poorly attended, it would be perceived as a failure, as a sign that no one cares about ahavat Yisrael (love of our fellow Jews). We finally decided that symbolism counted more than size; even if only a few people showed up, it would still make a strong statement about Jewish unity, about the fact that am Yisrael echad.

The night arrived, and we were blessed with exceptional weather. When my synagogue left the building to join the other groups, we were met by an enormous crowd. Beyond our wildest expectations, nearly 2,000 people came to dance, sing and celebrate Simchat Torah.

There was a feeling of excitement in the crowd. The possibility that somehow, am Yisrael echad, that Jews of all different types could unite was overwhelming, and many had tears in their eyes. Men and women danced separately out of respect for Halachah; Sephardim and Ashkenazim, Chassidim and Mitnagdim, Conservative, Reconstructionist and Orthodox danced together out of their love for klal Yisrael.

Afterwards, I reflected on this event; was there a fundamental change in the Jewish world? Will there be greater ahavat Yisrael because of this event? To be honest, the cynic inside me tells me that it was a temporary phenomenon, something that will last for only one night. How much of an impact can one night make?

However, even if this event did not change the world, it made a big difference in my life. There is a passage in the Talmud (Pesachim 50a) about Rabbi Yoseph who had a near death experience, and went to heaven. When he was revived, his father asked him what he saw in heaven. He answered, "Olam haphuch raiti" (I saw an upside down world). In heaven, Rabbi Yoseph saw that those who had prestige were often of lowly stature on earth, while those respected on earth often had little stature in heaven. These words "olam haphuch raiti" describe what I saw on Simchat Torah. The rest of the year, there are unbridgeable differences between the different factions of the Jewish people. We identify ourselves as Jews with hyphens: Orthodox-Jew, Reform-Jew, Conservative-Jew. However, on Simchat Torah "olam haphuch raiti," I caught a glimpse of an upside down world quite different from this earthly reality. I saw a heavenly world in which differences between Jews are forgotten and identifying hyphens are lost, a world in which we are all simply Jewish brothers and sisters.

Our Simchat Torah program did not solve the problems of Jewish disunity. However, 2,000 lucky people were able to peek at an upside down world and see what it must be like in heaven.

Jews around the world

Jews In Places You Never Thought Of*, edited by Karen Primack (KTAV, $29.50).

Books
Bernard Baskin

In this astonishing book, 45 exceptional Jews – doctors, social workers, anthropologists, rabbis, historians, lawyers – write about their firsthand experiences with little-known Jewish communities around the world. I never heard of most of them: the Telugu, Bnei Menashe and Shinlung of India; the Portuguese conversos of Belmonte and Braganza; the Afro-Portuguese and Moroccan Jews of Cape Verde off the west coast of Africa; the Balemba of South Africa; the Abayudaya Jews of Uganda; the Inca Indians of Peru; and the converso communities of Brazil and Mexico.

Most of these groups – small, poor and remote – have uncertain Jewish roots. Like the Beta Israel of Ethiopia whose Jewish origins were debated for decades before they were officially declared Jewish, these disparate communities have a difficult time in winning acceptance.

Few of them can trace their maternal line conclusively back to unquestioned Jews in the 1490s. Actually, how many of us could do that? Perhaps we should not be so strict with people who have an oral tradition that says they are of Jewish descent and who are even willing to die for their faith.

A liberal rabbi in Brazil offered a creative solution. "When a descendant of Marranos presented himself and asked to be considered a Jew, the rabbi devised a "reunification" ceremony rather than insisting upon a normal conversion." The individual was able to keep his pride, respect his family traditions and also undergo a ceremony acceptable under Halachah.

The Jews of San Nicandro of Southeastern Italy discovered Judaism through the reading of the Hebrew scriptures. Eventually they were converted and formally integrated into Italian Jewry. In 1949, in a joyous departure, 60 left for Israel.

One of the authors writes, "I am struck by the beauty – dare I say, miracle? – of a people who have been separated from mainstream Jewry for 2,000 years but have clung to a remnant of their faith, and now want to return to the Jewish people. I feel that long-lost brothers and sisters want to return home, but that they cannot do it by themselves. How can I not help them? How can I not embrace them?"

Where did these Jews come from? What is their origin? The greater part of the Jewish people was "lost" in the eighth century BCE, when the 10 northern Israelite tribes were conquered by Assyria, who intermingled them with the diverse populations under their control. Today it is probably their descendants who are found in India, Burma, Afghanistan, Pakistan and China.

Another large group of Jews were "lost" during the expulsion from Spain and Portugal in the 15th and 16th centuries. Many of them continued to practise Judaism in secret. Some of their descendants can be found today in Brazil, Mexico and even in the southwestern United States.

This book is published through the efforts of Kulanu (all of us), an organization created to find and assist lost and displaced Jews. It provides for them a measure of financial assistance, instruction in Judaism and the setting up of places of worship. In some cases they are helped to find a home in Israel.

Those interested in learning more about this unique organization and its program may write to, Kuleno, 11603 Gilsan Street, Silver Springs, MD, 20902-3122. There are always new opportunities to perform a mitzvah – and change lives.

Reading Hebrew focus of program

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In November, Jews throughout North America will participate in the first continent-wide program aimed at teaching reading the Hebrew language.

Read Hebrew America/Read Hebrew Canada is sponsored by the National Jewish Outreach Program (NJOP), based in New York.

During the month, times and locations will be staggered throughout the different locations wherever possible, so that the greatest number of people can take part.

A media release explains that at each location, a "qualified instructor will deliver a Hebrew reading course which will focus on teaching the Hebrew alphabet and basic reading skills to Jews with little or no background in Hebrew."

In Toronto, classes will be held at Beth Jacob on Tuesdays at 8 p.m., starting Nov. 3; at Bnai Torah on Mondays at 8 p.m., starting Nov. 9; at Kehillat Shaarei Torah on Sundays at 10:30 a.m. starting Nov. 8; and at Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, 31101 Bathurst St., Suite 401, on Wednesdays at 1:30 p.m. starting Nov. 4.

Aish Hatorah, which began the program Oct. 18, holds classes Mondays at 9 p.m.

The program will also take place at Ruth Academy, Shaare Zion Congregation, Congregation Beth Orah, and Congregation Beth Tikvah in the Montreal area; Beth Israel and Shaarey Zedek synagogues in Winnipeg; Beth Zion in Oshawa; Shaarei-Beth El Congregation in Oakville; and Temple Anshe Sholom in Hamilton.

Rabbi Ephraim Buchwald, founder and director of NJOP, said that "without the ability to read Hebrew, many Jews feel alienated from religious services and shy away from involvement in Jewish ritualistic observances and traditions."

Another benefit, he said, is that knowing Hebrew "will enable participants to better enjoy any future visits to Israel."

There is no charge for the program.

For more information, contact the participating organizations, or NJOP, at 1-800-44-HEBREW.

Yiddish classes study shtetl life in Europe

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Life in the shtetls of Eastern Europe is part of the history being taught to 75 children attending Yiddish classes.

The classes, held every Sunday morning at Associated Hebrew Schools, 6100 Leslie Avenue, are for children ranging from kindergarten to Grade 8.

"We're anxious that the children get some Jewish history because in some cases it may be the only Jewish education they are getting," said Naomi Miller-Tureck, coordinator, UJA Federation/Committee for Yiddish.

Those attending the classes are children from both public schools, and day schools sponsored by the Jewish Board of Education. Included are a few immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

The classes are funded by the Toronto District School Board and the York Board of Education, as part of the Heritage language program, and by UJA Federation.

"We're always ready to welcome new students," said Miller-Tureck. The classes started Sept. 13 and continue to the end of May. Any one interested can call the Yiddish hot line at 635-2883, ext. 150.

The teaching staff includes Brenda Ladowski (kindergarten), Ruth Gerlock (grades 1-3),and Debra Dunn (Grade 8).

Students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto act as teaching assistants.

Community Matters

Family Education Joins Generations

By Adi Neuberger

Jewish family education is being given a big boost this year, thanks to a $100,000 grant from the Saul M. Wagman Endowment Fund. Strengthening Jewish identity, through family education initiatives, coordinated by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, is a key component of the current community Campaign for Fifty.

UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education is designating $50,000 from the Wagman Fund for programs at nine supplementary schools. Four additional schools are expected to become grant recipients within the next month. More than 6,000 Jewish children attend supplementary schools across the city.

Educators like Dr. Ira Schweitzer of Temple Sinai, who runs ongoing family education initiatives for more than 110 families on what he calls a "shoestring budget," are pleased about being given much needed resources.

"The simple truth is that a large majority of the schools would not be able to develop and sustain what has become a very popular kind of participatory Jewish family education experience without UJA Federation's support," says Schweitzer.

Karen Goodis, Principal of Shaar Shalom Religious School, says the synagogue's bar and bat mitzvah program, which included 250 participants last year, provides an "invaluable opportunity for parents and children to study and learn Judaism together and open up a Jewish dialogue within families at critical life cycle moments."

The Downtown Toronto Jewish Community School, thanks to UJA Federation support, has hired part-time family educator Heidi Larman to conduct creative, grassroots programs for more than 225 families living in the city's downtown core. "Family education is particularly important for the hundreds of unaffiliated Jews in our community," notes Larman. "People come up with so many great ideas and now we can put them into action."

"Our goal is to get as many schools as possible to become active family educators," says Anne Glickman, the BJE's family education consultant.

"UJA Federation earmarked this money for family education because successful programs can empower both parents and children to develop stronger, more meaningful Jewish identities," says BJE Executive Director Rabbi Dr. Jeremiah Unterman. "This is an extremely important development because no matter how good the school is, if Jewish values and customs are not reinforced in the home, the child is at risk."

"This is critically important for the community's future," stresses Eileen Silver, Chair of the BJE's new Family Education Committee. "The goal is to transform homes into vibrant Jewish centres of practice and learning where Jewish identity can be nourished and protected."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, also on the committee, says "these grants also indicate that UJA Federation recognizes the significance of synagogues as gateways to Jewish life for many families."

Societies Support March of the Living

The new March of the Living Endowment Fund, sponsored by the UJA Federation Societies Division is off and running.

A $25,000 contribution by the Ostrovtzer Independent Mutual Benefit Society brings the Endowment total to over $40,000. The Fund will be used to augment UJA Federation scholarships for March of the Living participants.

Ostrovtzer President Albert Speisman says more than 200 members decided to donate such a large sum of funds because "it's the best way to give kids a reason to stay Jewish."

Many of UJA Federation's 6,000 Society supporters, like Fanny Pillersdorf, a chaperone on the 1998 March of the Living, are Holocaust survivors. "It's only natural for us to want to do whatever we can to make sure the younger generation doesn't forget what we went through," explains Pillersdorf, who lost her entire family during the War.

The 1998 March of the Living to Poland and Israel attracted a record 400 Canadian high school students. Program Chair Barbara Bank says the Endowment Fund will make sure every Toronto teen who wants to go on the mission to concentration camp sites will be afforded the opportunity for many years to come.

"This money will allow us to maintain our policy of not turning anyone away because of financial need," says Bank. "The Societies have placed their trust in these kids."

Benevolent Association marks 90th anniversary

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — The Toronto Independent Benevolent Association (TIBA) is celebrating its 90th anniversary on Nov. 1 with a banquet at Beth Radom Congregation.

The association, which now has about 250 members, many of whom are second and third generation, was started in order to provide comfort and support to its members in time of financial need or sickness, and to give members the opportunity to socialize in a Jewish environment.

Neil Cohen, president of the association, whose grandfather joined TIBA in the '20s and whose father joined in the '50s, says it is called an independent association because members were not required to have been born in a specific city, as was the case with most such groups.

His grandfather joined TIBA, says Cohen, because he was a diabetic and no other association would take him in. "Societies used to sponsor doctors, and the doctor would get paid from the dues. Many societies therefore, did not want someone who might rack up a lot of doctor's bills."

Up until about five years ago, the association still had its aktsia, a fund set up by, and contributed to, by members. "Anyone who needed money could borrow from the fund and arrange to pay it back weekly."

In 1932, TIBA was one of the first societies in Toronto to open a soup kitchen. "Today, we are trying to continue that tradition of caring. We do have a cemetery plot, but we are trying to make TIBA more than a burial society. We have two men and one woman who visit sick members, and we are always available, if necessary, to help make up a minyan. We still look out for each other as best as we can."

The association has more members than ever, says Cohen, "but the average age of members is creeping close to 60, and we are always looking for new members. We are looking to increase our family."

The TIBA executive meets about once a month, general membership meetings are held about six times a year, and social programs such as trips to Casino Rama are held throughout the year.

"We have women members, but voting members are men," he says.

The banquet is the association's first large celebration since its 75th anniversary banquet, and about 150 members are expected. Part of the proceeds from the banquet will go towards a donation to Shaare Zedek Medical Centre.

For information, call Cohen at 663-1161.

Non-Jewish children celebrate Sukkot

TORONTO — Children from the Shalom Food Project (SFP) breakfast club, none of whom are Jewish, recently celebrated Sukkot at the Winchevsky Centre's Camp Naivelt in Brampton.

The children, who live at the Supportive Housing Coalition in Toronto, were guests of the Morris Winchevsky School.

"For children who are accustomed to the pace of city life, a day in the country is a marvelous alternative," said SFP president Miriam Kalushner.

"To invite the kids to help celebrate Sukkot is a delightful and meaningful way to build bridges between communities," added Maxine Hermolin, the Winchevsky Centre's executive director.

Both groups of children performed a play about the holiday, followed by a session of traditional dancing and Yiddish songs. A group of shul children explained the symbols of Sukkot.

The group also visited a nearby pick-your-own apple orchard.

"The rewards the children reap from this kind of experience are immeasurable," said Kalushner.

Understanding motherhood

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Harriet Lerner

TORONTO — She may have written the book on motherhood, but psychologist Harriet Lerner has not been immune to making mistakes with her two sons. Nor is she immune to talking about them.

If a perfect mother existed, Lerner said in a recent lecture sponsored by Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, "you would not want to attend any lecture she would give. In fact, you wouldn't even want to be friends with such a person."

A capacity crowd of almost 1,300 filled the sanctuary and balcony at Adath Israel Congregation, confirming Lerner's assertion that mothers "hunger to hear the truth...about the good, the bad and the unspeakable."

Mothers can influence, but not control, their children's behavior, she said. Nor can mothers control the type of kids they get, she added.

Complaints teenage daughters have about their mothers generally fall into seven or eight categories, she discovered when talking to teens across the United States. Among them, their mothers

- are too busy for them, or the opposite – too focused on them;
- are too strict and rigid, or too much like a friend;
- don't tell them enough or tell them too much;
- lie to them or tell them more truth than they would ever want to hear;
- don't expect enough, or offer love that is too conditional;
- don't support the daughter's relationship with the father.

"An extreme response in either direction is not helpful," said Lerner.

"The mistake these girls make is that they assume when they become mothers, they're going to get it right...just wait."

One "great gift" a mother can give a daughter is to live her own life as well as possible – to put her "worry energy" into herself, said Lerner.

The 53-year-old Kansas-based psychotherapist is often asked by mothers how they can help their daughters become more assertive. "More important than what we tell them," she said, "is what we show them. When our words say one thing and our actions say another, actions speak louder."

She advised the audience to avoid perfectionism, to avoid any expert or book that makes them feel guilty, and to disbelieve any expert who predicts their daughters' future. When Lerner was 12, she said, her mother was told that she would never be college material.

As author of seven books, most recently The Mother Dance, as a staff psychologist and psychotherapist at Topeka's Menninger Clinic and as a monthly women's magazine columnist, she's disproved that prediction. Yet as a mother, "when I become anxious enough or intense enough, I have the brain of a reptile."

Adult women must learn that they can't change their mothers, Lerner stressed. It's also important for women to get to know their mothers, by using "creative" questions, and moving slowly. If the mother is no longer alive, it can be helpful to get to know more about her from relatives or friends, she said.

"If we don't really know our mothers, we don't really know ourselves. And if you're just focused on what's wrong with your mother and can't recognize her competence, you can't value and love yourself in the same way, which makes it then hard to love anybody else."

Daughters who have to be as unlike their mothers as possible "are no more independent than if they had to be exactly the same," said Lerner.

She defined independence as "staying connected to family members and being ourselves. It means we can take clear positions about things that matter to us, without having to change [our mother] so she sees things our way. It sounds very simple but it's very hard."

Lerner's address was the launch event of Women: An Agenda for Change, a program of the Toronto chapter of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Proceeds will support the university's Lafer Centre for Women's Studies. The centre's president, Galia Golan, spoke briefly on women's issues in Israel. Stevie Cameron, editor-in-chief of Elm Street magazine, introduced and thanked Lerner.

Syria missed 'golden' chances for peace: envoy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Syria missed golden opportunities to make peace with Israel in 1993 and again in 1995, according to Israel's former chief negotiator with the Syrians.

Had Syria's president, Hafez al-Assad, been more incisive and imaginative, Israel and Syria could have signed a peace agreement, said Itamar Rabinovich, a scholar who led Israel's negotiating team from 1992 to 1996, during Yitzhak Rabin's tenure as prime minister.

Although the talks failed to bring peace, Israel and Syria made "very significant" progress toward concluding a settlement, claimed Rabinovich, who holds the Yona and Dina Ettinger chair in contemporary Middle East history at Tel Aviv University. Recently, Rabinovich published a book about the talks, entitled The Brink of Peace: The Israeli-Syrian Negotiations.

In fact, the "rough outlines" of a deal were already hammered into place before Israel suspended the talks in the winter of 1996, following a series of devastating Palestinian suicide bombings in Israeli cities which Syria failed to condemn.

"I didn't invest 3½ years in vain," he observed, delivering the first Heather Reisman and Gerald Schwartz lecture at the University of Toronto.

Itamar Rabinovich

Rabinovich, who was Israel's ambassador to the United States during this period, expressed confidence that the negotiations will "resume at some point in the future and won't have to begin from scratch." He did not elaborate.

Due to serious procedural differences between the two sides, the talks remain frozen. The current Israeli government wants to reboot them without preconditions. Syria believes they should be restarted at the place they broke off, a position Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu rejects.

Reports suggest that both Rabin and his successor, Shimon Peres, were prepared to withdraw from the Golan Heights, captured from Syria during the Six Day War, in exchange for a fullblown peace treaty.

In August 1993, Rabin, through the good offices of U.S. secretary of state Warren Christopher, offered Assad a "hypothetical" proposal under which Syria would regain the Golan within the framework of such an agreement.

Assad, however, was only willing to to make peace with Israel under conditions Rabin considered unacceptable, Rabinovich disclosed.

As a result of Assad's response, Rabin resolved to concentrate on the Palestinian track, which culminated with the September 1993 Declaration of Principles.

In November 1995, after Rabin's assassination, Israel and Syria had another peacemaking opportunity, Rabinovich said.

On the day of Rabin's funeral in Jerusalem, U.S. President Bill Clinton asked Peres whether he intended to continue his predecessor's policy with respect to Syria.

Peres was keen to do so because he thought that Syria held the key to a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace accord.

But before he would commit himself to any particular course, Peres sought a face-to-face meeting with Assad to assure himself, and the Israeli public, that he had a genuine partner in Assad.

The Syrian president refused to engage in public diplomacy, claiming that such a meeting should occur after the signing of an agreement.

Later, Assad "melted a little," permitting his foreign minister, Faruk al-Shara, to grant Israeli television an interview. "But it was a terrible failure" because Shara displayed anger and hostility instead of conciliation.

Assad, too, declined to partake in secret diplomacy, wishing to preserve his Arab nationalist credentials. "This element was also missing in the negotiations," Rabinovich noted.

And, he added, Assad rejected Rabin's idea of a referendum to endorse any peace pact.

Rabinovich, who was recently appointed president-designate of Tel Aviv University, compared Assad to his counterpart in Egypt, the late Anwar Sadat, who signed a peace treaty with Israel in 1979.

In drawing this comparison, he listed a number of reasons why Assad did not seize the opportunities presented to him.

Assad, a member of the Alawite minority, does not rule Syria with the same authority as Sadat did in Egypt. And unlike Sadat, he is not a leader of great vision or boldness.

Furthermore, the Golan is much smaller than the Sinai Peninsula, leaving less room for manoeuverability.

Nevertheless, Rabinovich said, Assad was definitely interested in peace, but only on his own terms.

During a question-and-answer session, Rabinovich veered away from his measured approach by flatly predicting a war between Israel and Syria unless they reach a deal over the Golan. He left this thesis unexplained.

The event, which took place at U of T's George Ignatieff Theatre, was sponsored by Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University.

Jewish seniors lose resort facility

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The summer holiday plans of 100 to 150 Jewish seniors will be affected by the sale of the Jewish Camp Council's 223-acre Maple Lake resort near Parry Sound to the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ).

Possible alternative plans for a holiday program for the seniors include a period at the end of the summer of 1999 after the children at the summer camp have gone, said Ellen Nash, head of the Jewish Camp Council.

Other sites are also being considered for the subsidized seniors' holidays, said Nash. One of these is the Northwinds camp at Haliburton.

Maple Lake has a main lodge with meeting and conference rooms and several cabins. The CCRJ will continue to offer the use of the site as a retreat when it is not being used as a camp, she said.

Ella Krylov, the camp's social convener for the seniors, said she is opposed to the disruption of the seniors' holiday program known as Good Fellowship Lodge.

"This is more than a matter of money. Many of these seniors are Holocaust survivors, and the holiday they get at Maple Lake charges them up for the year." She said the Camp Council has sponsored senior holidays for 30 years.

Many of the seniors are subsidized, paying $500 instead of $700 for a 12-day holiday, Krylov said.

Demand for holidays at Maple Lake by seniors has decreased in recent years. Instead of eight periods being scheduled, only two periods took place this summer, Nash said.

Sale of the property makes sense since it was being under-utilized and the new owners will make it available most of the year round, she said.

Krylov said it is not known whether the new owners will operate a dining room that meets the standards of kashrut required by the seniors.

Furthermore, offering the seniors a holiday after the Reform camp closes is not a viable option in her opinion, as the water will be too cold.

Maple Lake will open in 1999 as a summer camp for children ages eight to 16, according to Gavin Herman, chair of the camp board and a member of the CCRJ executive.

The CCRJ's announcement of the sale indicated that financing of the $2-million to $3-million purchase will come from private donors.

STUDENT RETREAT

Grade 6 students from Bialik Hebrew Day School recently participated in a three day retreat at Maple Lake Lodge and Conference Centre. This annual educational program focuses on environmental studies and Jewish values, particularly the theme of teshuvah.

1948 war vets to be honored

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was the night of Nov. 29, 1947, and Joe Warner remembers listening to the radio. A bulletin reported that the United Nations had just voted to partition Palestine between Arabs and Jews.

"I knew the Arabs would not accept that, and there would be war," recalls Warner. "And I knew that if the Jews lost that war, it wouldn't be worth being a Jew anywhere."

"I couldn't sleep. I made up my mind to go that night."

The 22-year-old Torontonian became one of about 300 young, idealistic Canadians to elect to fight for the nascent Jewish state.

So did between 3,500 and 5,000 irregulars from the United States, Britain, South Africa, Canada and a handful of other countries who became members of the storied Machal, a Hebrew acronym for Volunteers from Abroad. Many had learned military tactics and fought in World War II. Some were non-Jews, and many were women.

On Nov. 9, Warner and roughly 30 surviving Machalniks in Toronto will join other Canadians who fought in the 1948 War of Independence at a special tribute at the Beth Avraham Joseph of Toronto congregation in Thornhill.

In addition to one-time Machalniks, the evening will pay tribute to those born in Palestine who were conscripted into the new state's army, as well as to the many Holocaust survivors and former partisans from Europe who made it to the Jewish state and signed up.

Slated to attend are surviving passengers of the Exodus, the ship whose plight helped launch Israel, as well those who fired on, and were aboard, the Altalena, the Irgun arms ship attacked by the rival Haganah.

Organizers say the evening will be the first time Canadian veterans of the '48 war will be honored as a group. In all, about 100 erstwhile fighters who have made Canada their home will be feted for helping Israel survive its first test by fire.

Each will receive a specially struck medal as a token of the Canadian Jewish community's appreciation, and a journal will collect their stories and photographs.

Special tribute will be paid to those killed in the war, including 11 Canadian volunteers. A total of 107 Machalniks died or went missing in action.

"I wanted to preserve this period," says event co-chair Joseph Adler. "These [the Holocaust and the creation of Israel] were the two most monumental events in modern Jewish history. If we don't take action, this will disappear from memory."

Adler's father Isser, also an honoree, was a concentration camp survivor who was later interned in Cyprus. Once in Palestine, Isser Adler volunteered for the army. Of the 120 men in his unit, 87 perished in a battle against the Egyptians at the Faluja pocket in the Negev in late 1948.

Warner, now 73 and retired from a pharmaceutical company, had trained as a wireless air gunner in the Royal Canadian Air Force during World War II. It was late in the war, and he was never sent overseas.

Spurred by the news of partition, he found a local recruiter, was sent to New York, and sailed for Palestine in March, 1948.

There he joined a Machal unit that provided the famed Givati Brigade with anti-tank support. Warner and his 80 fellow Machalniks helped the Israelis fight the Egyptians from July to November 1948. Miraculously, his unit suffered no fatalities.

"We were young and strong," he recalls with a glimmer in his eye. "We would do things an older person wouldn't do."

Warner says Israel didn't officially recognize the Machalniks' contributions until 1968. Earlier this year, Israeli President Ezer Weizman hosted the World Machal Reunion in Jerusalem. And during a Toronto visit last spring, former prime minister Shimon Peres paid tribute to the surviving Canadian volunteers.

Historian Irving Abella will act as MC for the tribute evening. Scheduled to attend is Defence Minister Art Eggleton.

"Just Between Us"

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

כמו שהבטחתי חדשות טובות:

Wagar '68 grads reminisce about old times

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The mood of the 30th anniversary reunion of Wagar High School's class of '68 was one of exuberance as former classmates gathered in Toronto to renew old friendships.

The party drew an estimated 150 people. Some travelled from as far away as Texas, Arizona, Florida, Vancouver and Tennessee for an evening of schmoozing and reminiscing.

But unlike most school reunions, which are generally held in a home town venue, the recent party for the Montreal-area high school was held at Hazelton Lanes, an up-scale mall in downtown Toronto.

The reunion garnered a lot of media attention because it was held in Toronto rather than Montreal. The Gazette, the Toronto Star, and the CBC national news all covered the story, while Montreal radio station CJAD and CFRB, its sister station in Toronto, broadcast live from the party for much of the evening.

Despite the media fanfare, reunion organizers insist that politics was not a factor in their choice of location. They said that because most of them now live in Toronto, it was the most convenient locale.

The idea for the reunion was hatched in Toronto when six Wagar grads from the class of '68 came together in Toronto as a result of an article about the predominantly Jewish suburb of Cote St. Luc, said Rivka (Gornostansky) Cranley, one of the six women.

Toronto Star columnist Antonia Zerbisias, a fellow Wagar graduate, had chronicled her return to her old neighborhood in August 1996.

Cranley said a few former classmates responded to the emotionally evocative story by contacting Zerbisias; they began getting together on a monthly basis and subsequently decided to organize a reunion.

"Essentially we were a group of ex-Montrealers, nostalgic about the old days and our old Montreal friends. We were determined to make the reunion happen and it was easier for us to do it in Toronto," Cranley said.

Locating the classmates took six months of hard-nosed sleuthing, said Clair (Field) Colodny, another reunion organizer. "I spent hours every night, phoning, e-mailing people, following up on leads."

She said she and fellow alumna Debbie (Skurnik) Giser, a key organizer in Montreal, e-mailed each other daily after midnight for months with leads and information as they hunted down names and addresses.

In the end, Colodny said, they were able to locate 335 of the 401 graduates. Of that number, 160 are in Montreal while close to 70 reside in the Greater Toronto Area. Some are in Ottawa and western Canada, and a large contingent are in the United States.

When asked if the fruits of her labor were worth the effort, Colodny was ecstatic in her response. "It was a fantastic party. I'm sorry it's over."

Cranley echoed her enthusiasm. "You said goodbye to people in June of 1968, said hello in October 1998, and it seemed that no time had passed despite many husbands and children later... We did a mitzvah by having the party. People kept saying, 'Thank you for doing this,' the whole night."

She said Montrealer Larry Miller, another reunion organizer, has already e-mailed her to say that he is planning to host the 40th reunion in Montreal.

Those Wagar graduates nostalgic about the past would be hard-pressed to recognize their alma mater, Bronia Hecht said in a telephone interview. A graduate of the class of '68, Hecht has been teaching art at Wagar for the last six years.

According to Hecht, the school's demographics have changed considerably. When she was a student, 95 percent of Wagar's student population of 2,000 was Jewish, while now there are only 500 students, most of them visible minorities who live outside of Cote St. Luc, she said.

In the '60s Wagar boasted some of the highest academic scores in the provincial matriculation exams, but the school has lost its academic prominence, Hecht noted.

She said she is thrilled that she has re-established friendships with some of her old high school chums in Montreal as a result of the reunion. "It's just wonderful to renew these old friendships again."

Kol Hastudentim developing its own national dream

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Heath Applebaum founded the Jewish Students Association (JSA) at Wilfrid Laurier University four years ago, he would have loved to have a resource like Kol Hastudentim.

The two-year-old independent, student-run organization, of which Applebaum became president in May, is made up of elected presidents of 14 Jewish campus organizations across Ontario. The presidents, in turn, elect Kol's four-person executive. (Applebaum's predecessor, Jason Young, now serves as the organization's director of finance.)

"We are a provincial, democratically elected student government. The way Canadian Jewish Congress [Ontario region] represents Ontario Jewry is the way we represent student Jewry," said Applebaum, a native of Toronto who attended Leaside High School.

Applebaum is 24 now and temporarily on hiatus from his studies, but not from his involvement with Kol. He recently completed a four-year BA in political science and international relations. In January he will begin studying public relations in a co-op diploma program run jointly by York University and Seneca College.

"There'd be a void in my life if I stopped [my Jewish involvement]," he said in a recent interview. Applebaum's involvement at Laurier was inspired in part by the example of his Orthodox grandfather, Cantor Benjamin Devor, who died in hospital, holding his grandson's hand, just after the latter returned from a summer trip to Israel in 1990.

"I can't help but sense he was passing the torch on to me," said Applebaum. "He made me realize I had an obligation to help the community."

When Applebaum inaugurated the JSA at his Waterloo, Ont. campus, he received practical support from Congress, Ontario region, but had no role models in the form of other Jewish student leaders, he recalled.

Heath Applebaum

"That's really the whole idea of Kol Hastudentim, sharing resources, information and ideas so people aren't starting from square one."

Since its inception, Kol has run leadership seminars, sponsored an annual ski trip/Shabbaton in Mont Tremblant and other province-wide events.

Most of the 14 affiliated campuses will run their own province-wide events this year.

This year Kol is adding to its roster of events. In the works is a February trip to New York, and a province-wide Holocaust candle vigil on Yom Hashoah.

"What we're trying to do is to inspire people to get more involved," said Applebaum. "All the campuses have common problems and concerns."

It wasn't until he represented Laurier's JSA at an early meeting of Kol Hastudentim that Applebaum became aware of "the big picture."

Applebaum would like to expand the network of student leaders nationwide. To that end, he took initial steps by meeting with about half a dozen student leaders from across the country at the Congress plenary held in Winnipeg in May.

At the initiative of some of the student delegates, a resolution was passed that a young Jewish adult (between ages 18 and 35) be appointed to one of four seats on the CJC's national officers' committee. Although the seat has not yet been filled, the passing of the resolution was "a major accomplishment," Applebaum believes.

He hopes that student leaders in other provinces will form their own counterpart organizations to Kol Hastudentim, and that eventually they will join forces to have an annual national student convention.

Meanwhile, he is in touch with about half a dozen Canadian Jewish student leaders via the Internet. "I'm in the process of bridging the gap."

On an international scale, he has been invited to represent Canada at a World Union of Jewish Students congress to be held in Israel in January.

Zany revue filled with nostalgia and fun

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The recent sold-out performances by the newly formed Seniors' Performing Group was a delightful experience for the audience and for the amateur performers who staged the spirited show.

The group of 26, 60-plus women and one man (he plays the piano), who performed A Zany Musical Revue, at Earl Bales Community Centre, sang, hoofed it up, and presented comedy skits which were filled with nostalgia and fun. "The most important aspect of this group is the bond of friendship that has formed," says Shirley Katz, administrative coordinator of the Seniors Performing Group and the MC for the shows.

Katz founded the group with Dorothy (Silverberg) Little, the group's artistic director who wrote and directed the show. Little's husband Louis plays the piano accompaniment for the performers.

Little told The CJN that Louis had a stroke six years ago, and although he was left with aphasia – a speech impediment – and minor mobility problems, "the group has given us both such a feeling of fulfilment. We look forward to every rehearsal, and Louis enjoys playing for the group because they are all so enthusiastic."

Little, who worked as a bridal consultant and fashion show coordinator added, "I have never been in such a compatible group. I credit [Katz] who sets the tone. She is concerned, diplomatic and above all, she wants to enjoy."

Katz, recently retired from the Ministry of Culture and Communication where she was an arts officer involved with promoting Ontario's culture, says, "Enthusiasm is the prime requirement for our members."

Dorothy Gertenberg, who is in charge of costumes, is an example of enthusiasm and creativity, says Katz. "She took a piece of curtain and it became a dress, and Carmen Miranda's elaborate headpiece was fashioned from a margarine tub."

Muriel Scanlon, who presented a Gershwin medley, was one of the lead soloists. Miriam Schott and Lillian Friendly added humor to their musical performances.

Versions of Sophie Tucker, Barbra Streisand, Sonny and Cher, Tom Jones and other celebrities – Old Spice Girls, The Golden Yentas among others – demonstrated the spunkiness of the seniors.

Some of the other performers included, Vivian Wright, Ray Kay, Betty Shulman, Edith Abrams, Helen Batcher, Sandy Boxer, Eve Goldberg, Shirley Luxenberg, Kay Rodness, Betty Shulman, Claire Husdan and Lila Lerner.

Many members of the group performed in shows presented by the Well Group – a seniors' community social club at Earl Bales. They formed the independent Seniors Performing Group whose activities also include attending theatre productions, and visiting museums and galleries.

Katz says the group was "overwhelmed" when the 175 seats for each performance were sold out weeks before the show. "It was amazing – within one week from the time the tickets went on sale we were sold out."

Chaplains serve seniors

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Lori and Ernest Gershon, trained volunteer chaplains, help administer to the spiritual and cultural well-being of seniors.

Although they are not retired "yet," the couple believe that volunteering has been a step towards that stage of life.

"Volunteerism is the kind of profession that fits very well into the active senior years and brings a great deal of satisfaction, particularly for people who use the professional skills they developed over the years," says Ernest, 64.

Lori and Ernest volunteer at Castleview-Wychwood Towers, a long-term care facility for residents who are disabled, and at Baycrest Terrace, a residence for well elderly at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Chaplain Rev. Lillian Curtis, coordinator of spiritual and religious care for all faiths at Castleview-Wychwood spoke to The CJN about the vital Jewish program at Castleview-Wychwood, where there are some 30 to 40 Jewish residents.

"I appreciate the Gershons' work, commitment and expertise which provide a viable Jewish program at Castleview-Wychwood. They head the Shalom group made up of family members of residents and former residents, and volunteers who assist with Sabbath and holiday services, festivities and other religious and cultural needs."

The Shalom Congregation was formed to hold services at the building on Christie Street. The Sabbath and High Holy Day services for all the Jewish residents are frequently led by the Gershons, who also coordinate Shabbat volunteers.

"Ernest and Lori are always there when I need someone to sit with a dying Jewish resident, to comfort family members, to arrange burial and memorial services when needed or to perform any other spiritual need," says Rev. Curtis.

The Gershons moved to Toronto from Chicago 20 years ago "because we fell in love with Toronto," says Lori, who was in desktop publishing, primarily with health care clients.

Ernest, who worked in health care insurance, is presently a partner in CAPCO Health Group Inc. and its subsidiary, Treatment Operations.

The couple became active volunteers when their three sons were teenagers, and often took their children with them to visit residents in nursing homes. They also served as lay leaders for religious services at a small Reform temple in Chicago.

After moving to Toronto, Lori received a master's degree at the University of Toronto in Near Eastern Studies specializing in biblical Hebrew, and attended a summer program of the Board of Jewish Education for religious school teachers.

The Gershons joined Holy Blossom Temple "because we felt it had the best Judaic and Hebrew programs."

Lori led the bar and bat mitzvah programs there and taught Hebrew and prayers at Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

They received on-the-job chaplaincy training working with Rev. Curtis and the Jewish Family & Child Service, and they both have the equivalent of a post-graduate degree in chaplaincy.

"We are shnorers for the Shalom Congregation," says Ernest. "If we can get food, entertainment or other items donated for services and holidays and other events, we do."

Ernest says he spends several mornings a week at Baycrest Terrace, where, he notes, the residents have different needs from those at Castleview-Wychwood. The visits to Baycrest provide their own brand of spiritual and emotional healing, he adds.

"It is a well known fact that the period after retirement is a very dangerous one because people stop having something to challenge themselves. Doing nothing is a dangerous step for mental and physical health. Volunteerism can be the answer," Ernest says.

Time of your life

These comics aren't retiring

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Sam Rosen and Norm Winkler, retirement has turned out to be a barrel of laughs. The longtime friends, who met through their wives, cemented their friendship years ago with the discovery that both men were fans of comedian Jackie Mason.

Last year, the pair started doing their own standup routines, calling themselves the Comedy Guys. Now something that began as a kibitz has become a second career of sorts.

The Comedy Guys' first gig was in front of 155 people at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation last November. They were invited to perform by a friend who'd been a guest at the Winkler sukkah the previous month.

"We were trading jokes," recalled Rosen in an interview, "and he said, 'I need a good program.'"

The event was so successful that a followup in March drew an audience of over 170. Some of the best speakers in the city don't get that large an audience, Rosen pointed out.

"People like to laugh," said Winkler.

Word of mouth led to more invitations to perform: for the WEL (Women Enjoying Life) group at Earl Bales Park, for an over-40 couples group at the Centennial Centre, and for other clubs and synagogue groups.

"We don't talk dirty," explained Rosen, "[although] we may make a few suggestive jokes."

"It's amazing how much you can laugh at good clean humor," said Winkler.

Much of their material is geared to a Jewish audience. Rosen takes the stage first, followed by Winkler, and they have put together three separate one-hour shows, so as not to repeat jokes if they are invited for a subsequent performance.

"And yet," noted Winkler, "if you hear a good joke told well, people like to hear it again. It's like a good song, or a good impersonation."

A Toronto-born former advertising manager for an office manufacturing firm, Winkler often incorporates a thick Irish brogue or heavy Yiddish inflection into his shtick. He's honed his performing skills doing magic at parties, and still has a 25-year-old newspaper clipping about a magic show he did to raise money for Israel.

He's been collecting jokes and funny stories for years, and is working on a book that promises to be humorous in format as well as in content.

Rosen, a one time self-employed printer who was born and raised in Niagara Falls, Ont., traces his humor career back to his daughter's wedding 12 years ago.

Eschewing the "formal and boring" type of speech suggested by the bridal consultant, he decided to "take a gamble," offering his daughter's room for rent and telling how, at his own wedding, he stepped on the rabbi's foot instead of the glass. "Everybody was shocked."

He soon found himself being invited to take the microphone on a variety of occasions – a retirement roast here, a shul retreat there.

"I've always loved jokes. It was a way for me to break out of my shyness," he said.

Even as a hospital patient when he had a kidney transplant two years ago, Rosen kept telling jokes. "The guy in the next room said, 'How come all the nurses come into your room all the time?' "

Both men would advise new retirees to find something they like to do. "Never vegetate," said Rosen.

"I'm having more fun now than I did working. I would bet the majority are not happy in their jobs," said Winkler. "Laughter is the best medicine."

Ottawa Jewish Archives opens its doors

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The official opening of the Ottawa Jewish Archives in the Ages Family Building was a momentous day in the history of the Ottawa Jewish Historical Society (OJHS), according to the society's president, Lawrence Freedman.

The new facility has specially designed shelving, a storage vault, humidity and fire control, and will store all archival material electronically.

Freedman thanked all those who helped raise the funds to bring the archives into the electronic age, and praised the staff members for their dedication and hard work.

In his introduction of Gdalyah Rosenfeld, master of ceremonies for the evening, Freedman said, "This gentleman was instrumental in finding the site for the campus where you sit tonight."

This was, Rosenfeld said, "an evening of celebration, an evening to thank the community for the building of this particular building, the Joseph and Rose Ages Family Building... This is an evening to honor Shirley Hettler Berman for her outstanding contribution to the community... and not least, this is the official opening of the Jewish archives. Tonight we are guaranteeing the future of the recorded history of the Jewish community of Ottawa. We have succeeded in creating one of the best regional, ethnic archives in Ottawa. None of this would have been possible without Shirley Berman."

Rosenfeld praised several past presidents of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir for their efforts in helping the OJHS to create and maintain the archives. In particular, he named Dr. Bernard Dolansky and Lawrence Greenberg, current president Barbara Farber and executive director Mitchell Bellman. He thanked Stephen Victor and Roger Greenberg who co-chaired the capital campaign that raised the funds for the new facility. He also recognized the efforts of Elliott Gluck, who was instrumental in making major changes to the archives' structure; of Margie Kardash of the Vaad Ha'Ir; and of the project architect.

In honoring retiring archivist Berman, Rosenfeld referred to her as "a unique individual to meet a unique challenge." As archivist for the OJHS, Berman was a "choice of excellence. The community and the OJHS are beneficiaries of this choice."

Endowment fund launched

In recognition of Berman's 25 years of service, an endowment fund was established by the Ottawa Jewish Community Foundation, to be known as the Shirley and Shier Berman Fund for the Ottawa Jewish Archives. Berman was also presented with roses and her husband, Shier, received a gift for his support and assistance.

Berman reminisced about her early days as archivist, when she saved clippings from the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin after the then-editor threw them out.

An endowment fund was also established to honor Freedman, and a certificate was presented by Rose Taylor, president of the Ottawa Jewish Community Foundation.

Following the presentations, everyone was invited to view the pictorial exhibit in the social hall, to tour the new state-of-the-art combined library and archives, and to mingle over refreshments at the reception which followed.

Hadassah Bazaar ends its long run in Hamilton

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Columnist

HAMILTON — For the first time since 1924, there will be no Hadassah Bazaar in Hamilton this fall.

The city was one of the earliest communities to have a Hadassah-WIZO chapter, and the annual fall bazaar has been its biggest fundraiser, almost from the beginning.

But now, "times have changed, and so have we," says Hadassah-WIZO executive secretary Andrea Stringer.

There seems to be a general belief among members that decreasing manpower in recent years is responsible for the bazaar's demise, but according to Stringer, that's not the whole story.

It is true, she says, that not as many members have been turning out for the preparatory work in recent years as in the past, but on the day itself, "everyone came out to help. Manpower is the least of our worries. Volunteerism isn't dead."

Rather, it's the proliferation of discount and dollar stores that's to blame, she contends.

The ends of lines and seconds that manufacturers used to give away, which were always a staple at the bazaar, are now being sold to discount and dollar stores, she explains. Furthermore, manufacturers now have their own outlets. "So why give the stuff away if they can sell it?"

And with rising advertising costs, higher hall rentals and other expenses also increasing, the bazaar was no longer profitable. And so, after almost 75 years and three generations of workers, "we have moved on to a new and better project."

The new project is a Fall Fantasy Auction on Nov. 21, 6:30 p.m. at Temple Anshe Sholom. Admission is $20 per person. Proceeds from the event will go to women's shelters in Israel, and to Martha House in Hamilton, a shelter run by the Good Shepherd Services.

There will be silent and live auctions, finger food, wine and cheese and a bake table featuring the renowned baking of Hadassah's Hungarian members.

Items to be auctioned include a Dodge Saturn; a man's suede jacket with fur-lined hood from Hugo Boss; a fur jacket from Hamilton's leading furrier, Jordan Livingston; a Roots Olympic podium jacket; diamond jewelry; as well as trips, hotels, restaurant meals and sports equipment.

It's a fun project, "cleaner, with less schlepping and not such a long day [as the bazaar]," says past president Sheila Levitt, co-convener with Terry Overholt, of what all hope will become a successful annual event.

Vancouver Island's Cong. Emanu-El gets new rabbi

By SUZANNE KORT
Pacific Correspondent

VICTORIA — Rabbi David Seidenberg has been hired to replace Rabbi Victor Reinstein as spiritual leader of Congregation Emanu-El, Vancouver Island's only synagogue.

Rabbi Seidenberg, who has lived and studied in Philadelphia, New York, Jerusalem and Los Angeles, chose Victoria because, he says, he wants to be part of a smaller, more intimate community, and be closer to nature.

Rabbi Seidenberg led High Holy Day services at the synagogue this fall, and will lead Shabbat services until November, when he returns to Los Angeles for a month to research his PhD at the University of Judaism.

At the Tashlich service, held at the shore of the Strait of Juan de Fuca, Rabbi Seidenberg reminded the large crowd that though [God] is infinite, the ocean is not and cannot absorb humanity's waste forever.

On Hoshanah Rabah, the seventh day of Sukkot, he organized a service at Goldstream Park, a nearby wilderness area. The outdoor service, dedicated to the health of our rivers and seas, used the hoshanah liturgy, and included a discussion of river ecology led by local environmental educator, Richard Kool.

Rabbi Seidenberg has received several awards for his work, including the Kohut Memorial Prize in Rabbinic Literature (1995) and the Friedenwald and Rubenovitz Prizes in theology (Peace Prize: 1994). In 1995, he founded Ansche Chesed, a chassidic egalitarian minyan in New York, and served as its rabbinic adviser until 1997.

Hockey instructor developed expertise in Europe

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — During the height of the Cold War when Western athletes confronted their Soviet counterparts on sports fields around the world, East Bloc coaches often came in for merciless ribbing. If they boasted college degrees in disciplines like backchecking, cross-country skiing and the breaststroke, they deserved it, we thought.

Our hockey coaches, the Don Cherrys among us would point out, graduated from the school of hard knocks, not some fancy-shmancy institute that churns out so many degrees you could wallpaper a kitchen wall wid 'em.

My how times have changed. Rednecks notwithstanding, it turns out European coaches really knew what they were talking about, at least as far as hockey man Larry Ruch is concerned.

Ruch is part of a new breed of hockey maven, a man equally comfortable in two worlds – that of the hard-nosed skater who toils on the ice, and that of the academic who develops contemporary teaching techniques and innovative game strategies.

For nine years, Ruch coached Swiss and Austrian teams to championship seasons, butting heads with coaches from Russia, Sweden and the Czech Republic.

This year, despite an offer to coach in the Swiss first division, he's back in his native Canada, tutoring teams and individuals at the Beatrice Ice Gardens at York University. There he provides instruction in everything from power skating to on-ice drills. Seminars are available for coaches to instruct them in running effective practices, developing defencemen, implementing forechecking systems and planning breakouts.

It may not be as exciting as coaching a Swiss elite league team or a bunch of Austrian professionals, but it does keep him active in the world of teaching. With a law degree from the University of Ottawa and education studies at McGill, Ruch has always been intrigued by teaching. That applies equally to the classroom or on the ice.

That's what makes European hockey so enjoyable for him, he said. With its high practice-to-play ratio (three or four to one), there's more time to develop effective practices and teach hockey skills and systems. His teams featured a fast break, frequent "picks" (blocking opponents from the puck carrier), exploiting other teams' weaknesses and focusing on offence. The practices made it easier to implement those coaching schemes, and the players were very receptive to it, he said.

Ruch, 39, was introduced to coaching during his college days. A native of Laval, just north of Montreal, Ruch was studying education at McGill University, and tending goal for the university's hockey team at the time. Although he had a shot at an American Hockey League tryout, his coach, Ken Tyler, asked him to stay with the team as his assistant. Later, while coaching at Dawson College in Montreal, Tyler asked Ruch to join him as his assistant with Hockey Club Ajoie in the Swiss elite league.

In 1988, Ruch agreed to go for one season. "That eight months turned into nine years."

In addition to working with the top team, Ruch was put in charge of developing the club's entire hockey program, which included junior, midget, bantam and novice teams. "You're a total program developer. You give clinics and teach the coaches," he said.

Although he did serve behind the bench of the elite team, mostly he focused on the junior team. In two years, the juniors became Switzerland's French division champions.

Though he toiled in what some would consider a hockey backwater, Ruch felt intense pressure to perform. "In Europe, he said, "I never repeated drills in a season. It's very demanding."

The lifestyle and the money were good ($100,000 tax free, free car, free house), but "as foreigners you're hired to do a job and are extremely accountable for the success of the club," he said.

Porrentrui, home of the Ajoie club, had a population of only 6,000, but about 5,000 people would jam into the town's rink for weekly games. Hockey Night in Porrentrui, on Wednesdays and Saturdays, was very popular and would attract people from the surrounding region.

Most Swiss teams were stocked with local boys (60 percent in Ajoie) bolstered by a couple of Canadians, usually smaller, quicker players.

"In Europe, my teams stressed finesse, speed, preparation and discipline," he said. Although a bone-jarring Canadian-style (legal) hit usually draws a penalty from the refs, European hockey is exciting and entertaining, despite the frequent dives, Ruch maintains.

After his second year with Ajoie, when the junior team won the championship, he was offered a contract to run the hockey program in Geneva. The club was bankrupt and in last place but Ruch took on the challenge and focused on developing good junior players. After four years, the professional team, stocked with juniors he'd trained, finished first. A year later, after he left, the team won the league championship.

From Geneva, Ruch went to Longenthal, in the German part of Switzerland. "I had a great team there. We were in second place at Christmas when I got sick and I had to come back to Canada."

While living in Ottawa, he met his fiancée, Angela. When she was transferred to Toronto, Ruch came too and completed his master's thesis in education. In mid-1996, Ruch took a job with an Austrian second division team, Lustenau, and in that season he took the team to the division championship. From there, he went to Basel, Switzerland for a year to coach the city's first division team, focusing on player development.

Now with a daughter, Kyla, and with an offer from the Beatrice Ice Gardens, Ruch has returned to his hockey-mad Canadians, to some of the coaching techniques so commonly employed in Euro-hockey.

Wye ends 19-month stalemate in peace process

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

WYE MILLS, Md. — Israel and the Palestinians gave the peace process new momentum last week by signing a memorandum of understanding that outlines the specific steps that both sides must take to end a 19-month stalemate and move toward a permanent peace settlement.

Before a standing room only crowd in the East Room of the White House, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, and President Bill Clinton — acting as a guarantor of the deal — signed a brief but detailed memo that took months of relentless shuttle diplomacy and 10 days of secluded summit work to hammer into form.

The extraordinary signing ceremony, which came just an hour after the completion of the summit at the Wye River Plantation in Maryland and just an hour before the onset of the Jewish Sabbath, was all the more extraordinary for the presence of Jordan's King Hussein, who has been undergoing cancer treatment in the United States and who helped bring the sides together in the final days.

The memo calls for several specific steps to be undertaken immediately, including a session of the Palestinian National Council, which according to the agreement must annul the clauses in the Palestinian charter that call for the destruction of Israel. Clinton is planning a December trip to the region to address that session.

The president said Friday he would ask Congress to approve additional financial aid for Israel to help ensure its security and for the Palestinians to help their economic development.

In an interview with Ha'aretz in New York, Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon said that while the agreement is an achievement, he still thinks that giving up 13 percent of the West Bank is dangerous. It was not clear whether Sharon would throw his weight behind the agreement or abstain from an upcoming cabinet vote on it.

In a letter to Netanyahu from U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright that is attached to the memorandum, Albright reaffirms the principle of "co-dependent" stages in the implementation of the agreement; this means that Israel can halt its withdrawal from the territories if the Palestinians do not abide by their commitments. According to the letter, no stage in the process will be implemented without the previous stage being fully executed.

Despite Israel's insistence that Arafat drop his threat to unilaterally declare a Palestinian state on May 4, 1999, when the five-year Interim Period set out in the Oslo accords is over, Arafat said over the weekend that a Palestinian state would be established quickly.

"It is coming very soon," he told reporters in Austria after briefing European Union leaders on the Wye Memorandum. "On May 4, 1999... we have the right to declare our independent Palestinian state and we hope that it will happen according to our agreement between both of us," he said.

Meanwhile, referring to the Israel redeployment in the West Bank, a source in the IDF called the required withdrawal from 13.1 percent of Area C (exclusively controlled by Israel) and 14.2 percent from Area B (jointly controlled with the PA) a Gordian knot.

According to the Wye Memorandum, the first two percent has to be handed over in the next two weeks. Sources say that the redeployment will cost about NIS 1 billion.

The withdrawal will be taking place in three main areas: Jenin, where the withdrawal will create Palestinian territorial contiguity from Nablus to Jenin; the southern Hebron area; and in the "nature reserve" east of Hebron.

Ten army bases will have to be moved and 10 roads paved, said army sources. Most of the roads are short bypasses for isolated settlements, but two are relatively major roads – one from Arad to Ma'ale Adumim, and the other from Modi'in to Givat Ze'ev. Fifteen settlements are expected to see beefed up security arrangements as they are left relatively isolated in the midst of Palestinian territories.

Jewish groups welcome deal

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish organizations have welcomed the Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement reached late last week at the Wye Plantation in Maryland.

The agreement provides for Israel's phased redeployment from an additional 13 percent of the West Bank in exchange for enhanced, verifiable efforts by the Palestinian Authority in fighting terrorism, and the abrogation of provisions in the Palestine National Covenant calling for Israel's destruction.

"With this deal, there will be a precise, indisputable methodology for tracking Palestinian compliance with its commitments. This should go a long way toward reassuring Israelis that the concessions they are being asked to make will not endanger their security, said Brian Morris, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee.

"At the same time, the Palestinian community will now be better positioned to achieve its social, economic and political aspirations," he added.

Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen commended the interim agreement, calling it an important step forward in the peace process.

He said that one of the major concerns in the mind of Israelis remains the issue of security. "Until there is security, there can be no political stability," he said.

To help alleviate these concerns, he called on the Palestinian leadership to "do everything in its power to prevent terrorist attacks while dealing sternly with the perpetrators of these acts.

"Hamas can no longer be allowed to put Israelis at risk," Ronen added. "They are the eneenemies of peace."

Ronen praised the efforts of U.S. President Bill Clinton and King Hussein of Jordan in helping to bridge the gap between the two parties. He also welcomed the involvement of the CIA in helping to stem terrorist activities.

Lawrence Hart, president of B'nai Brith Canada, said that they were pleased that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu found a way to continue the peace process started by the Oslo Accords.

"This is a historic step in the Middle East, with the increasing recognition of Israel by the Palestinians as a reality that will not go away and a commitment to live together in a real peace," he said.

Hart said that Palestinian Chairman Yasser Arafat has had, and still has, the choice of making peace with Israel or with terrorists.

The agreement now, he said, marks a "giant step towards peace with Israel and we look forward to Arafat's implentation of its Articles."

Opposition to agreement stiffer than expected

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu convened his Likud cabinet ministers earlier this week to discuss the Wye memorandum in detail. He decided on the meeting after speaking to several ministers on the phone, and discovering that the opposition to the agreement was much broader than he had thought.

The prime minister postponed the full cabinet meeting until Wednesday. Before then he devoted his time to persuading right wing ministers and MKs to support the agreement, sources said.

Ministers who compared the English and Hebrew versions of the Wye River memorandum found substantial differences between the two in several key clauses, such as the clause dealing with the cancellation of the Palestinian covenant.

According to the ministers, the Hebrew version favors the Israeli position more than the English version, which is the determining one.

The differences in the versions was discussed at a meeting of Likud ministers.

Meanwhile, Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon is to go to Washington next week to meet with Secretary of State Madeleine Albright in an effort to settle the amount of special aid Israel will get to help finance troop redeployments in the West Bank.

U.S. President Bill Clinton confirmed over the weekend that he recommended the aid in order to compensate Israel for the security dangers created by the second further redeployment. He added that he would also recommend granting U.S. aid for the "economic development" of the Palestinians.

Clinton did not define the scope of the aid, but before the summit at the Wye River Plantation, Netanyahu sent Albright a request for $500 million (US) – half the sum he asked for last May.

Congress is expected to support Clinton's recommendation, but according to reports from Washington, it is also likely to demand supervision over how the money is spent.

Sources in Washington say the Americans are concerned that the Israeli government will channel some of the funds, directly or indirectly, to Jewish settlements.

The U.S. aid is intended for moving military bases and paving about 20 bypass roads. Work on the roads is expected to begin soon. The main difficulty is likely to be completing the road work before the withdrawals are finished, a three-month period.

Defence sources have said that ahead of the evacuation of Palestinian towns in 1995, bypass roads were paved "at a record speed" within a similar period of time, but most of them were paved very poorly, and are now the object of derision.

IDF to vacate 10 bases

The security establishment has warned against a recurrence of such a situation.

In keeping with the Wye agreement, the IDF will have to vacate about 10 bases in the West Bank. The IDF is not expected to have any difficulty vacating the installations within three months. The first base might be the Nahal brigade outpost Irit, south of Jenin.

Yitzhak Mordechai convened the first meeting in a series of discussions with heads of the security establishment on the implementation of the second further redeployment.

The defence minister also met with the chief of staff, the chief of IDF intelligence, the head of the Shin Bet security service and the committee for security cooperation.

Pollard's wife angry, says Israel 'shafted'

TORONTO — Israel was "shafted" after believing that convicted spy Jonathan Pollard might become part of the Wye River peace accord, says Pollard's Toronto-based wife.

U.S. President Bill Clinton gave Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu verbal assurances that Pollard would be released from his life sentence, "but not in writing, and Clinton [later] reneged," charges Esther Pollard, who said she got her information from "sources" close to the talks.

"The only reason the Israelis made heavy concessions [at the talks] was because they thought they were getting Pollard," Esther Pollard told The CJN on Sunday. "It was a done deal."

At one point, Israel radio was reporting that Pollard would be released.

It was the Palestinians who "played the Pollard card," she said, in exchange for getting Israel to drop its demand for the extradition of Gazi Gibati, the police chief of Gaza.

Pollard said she puts no stock in Clinton's assurances that he would "review" the case of her husband, who received a life sentence in 1987 for passing classified information to Israel.

"It's a code word. It means absolutely nothing."

And she chided Israel for giving up on Pollard, after fighting for him vigorously at Wye River.

"Israel went to the mat for him and then said 'uncle,'" she said.

Majority of cabinet supports Wye accord

By YERAH TAL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — The Israeli cabinet was expected to approve the newly signed Wye accord at its next meeting, with at least nine ministers already having declared their support for the second redeployment. Four ministers have voiced opposition and four others are still sitting on the fence.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was to convene the cabinet this week, before the Knesset's vote on the accord next week.

Netanyahu's vote for the agreement is expected to be supported by two of the three ministers who were with him at Wye – Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky – as well as Health Minister Yehoshua Matza (Likud), Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani (The Third Way), Interior Minister Eli Suissa (Shas), Labor and Social Affairs Minister Eli Yishai (Shas), Tourism Minister Moshe Katsav (Likud) and Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman.

Expected opponents include Education Minister Yitzhak Levy (National Religious Party – NRP), Transport Minister Shaul Yahalom (also NRP), Immigrant Absorption Minister Yuli Edelstein (Yisrael b'Aliyah), and Agriculture and Environment Minister Rafael Eitan (Tsomet).

Still undecided are Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon, Justice Minister Tzachi Hanegbi, Communications Minister Limor Livnat, and Science and Technology Minister Silvan Shalom – all of Likud.

Netanyahu met with the undecided ministers in an effort to convince them to vote with him. Mordechai and Sharansky are expected to join the campaign, and so is Sharon – in spite of his own reservations about the agreement. Sharon has so far continued to cling to his assertion that a withdrawal from 13.1 percent of the West Bank will jeopardize Israel's security.

Sources in the Prime Minister's Office said they expected Netanyahu would manage to convince Hanegbi, Livnat and Shalom to vote for the Wye accord after explaining its minutiae to them. The sources said Netanyahu was less likely to prevail with the NRP's Levy and Yahalom, and with Tsomet's Eitan. As for Edelstein, the sources said they hoped he could at least be convinced to abstain.

Shas party chair Aryeh Deri said yesterday that the party's spiritual leader, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, who is expected to instruct his party's two cabinet members to vote for the accord, will do so only after reviewing the text of the agreement with the Shas Council of Torah Sages.

Eitan, speaking out against the agreement, said its demands of the Palestinians had already been stated in past accords, which he said the Palestinian Authority has ignored.

Eitan refused to say whether his party would vote for holding early elections.

Chabad releases letter

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Chabad movement yesterday released a 2½-year-old letter from Benjamin Netanyahu, in which he promised to block the establishment of a Palestinian state and the transfer of any additional territory to the Palestinians.

The letter, also signed by Ariel Sharon, is dated May 17, 1996 – just 12 days before Netanyahu defeated Shimon Peres for the prime ministership by 29,457 votes.

The letter also promised that the IDF would be free to fight terrorism "anywhere."

Chabad rabbis said Netanyahu and Sharon came to Kfar Chabad to woo voters, promising they would "save the State of Israel from the Oslo trap."

The rabbis cited Netanyahu as having said he expected a conflict to develop between Israel and the Palestinians after his election, during which Israel would likely enter Area A territory and regain control.

The Chabad leaders said that when they asked Netanyahu why he was publicly declaring his intent to uphold Oslo, he responded, "One must act wisely."

Wye signals Likud shift

Along with the Palestinians' promise to publicly revoke their charter, the agreement hammered out after nine days of roller-coaster talks at the Wye Plantation in eastern Maryland includes the following provisions:

- an Israeli troop redeployment from an additional 13 percent of the West Bank;
- the release of some 700 Palestinian prisoners from Israeli jails;
- opening safe passage routes for Palestinians travelling between the West Bank and Gaza; and
- a comprehensive security arrangement, carried out with CIA oversight, under which the Palestinian police will arrest terrorist suspects, and confiscate unlicensed weapons.

The deal was nearly scuttled by a last-minute dispute over an Israeli request that the United States free Jonathan Pollard, a former U.S. naval intelligence analyst who has been serving a life sentence since 1987 for spying for Israel. Clinton ultimately agreed to reconsider Israel's request for Pollard's release, but without making any commitments about the outcome or time frame of a decision.

The "test" of the Wye agreement, say many politicians and pundits, will be in its implementation.

Indeed, the agreement could quickly unravel in the face of less-than-firm determination on the part of either side to carry out the intricate process of implementation, which spans a crowded 12-week schedule.

That period will doubtless be replete with crises, some evolving out of ongoing negotiations surrounding the implementation itself, some engendered by the provocations of opponents of the accord on the radical fringes of both Palestinian and Israeli society.

Timely implementation will be critical, but it should not be overlooked that the moving White House signing ceremony – with Jordan's King Hussein in attendance despite his battle with cancer – was in itself an event of indelible political significance.

Already, stress lines are beginning to form within Israeli parties on both ends of the political spectrum.

Witness, for example, the Labor party's reaction to the Wye agreement.

Labor leader Ehud Barak said this week his party would give the agreement its support in the Knesset – thus ensuring a sweeping majority there.

But in the next breath, Barak said his party would work toward toppling the Netanyahu government and forcing early elections.

In this one case at least, he was saying that Labor would make common cause with the ultra-rightist Moledet party and with rightist renegades within the governing coalition to bring down Netanyahu for signing the Wye accord.

But this plan is being openly challenged by some prominent figures within Labor, among them former prime minister Shimon Peres.

They feel that to oppose the government now, before implementation has even begun, would be construed by the public as opposition for opposition's sake, or, worse, as opposing peace.

They add that the best interests of peace would be served by the present, Likud-led government actually withdrawing the army from a significant portion of Eretz Israel.

If implementation does not take place according to schedule, they say, there will then be time enough for Labor to take issue with Netanyahu.

The confusion in Labor is mirrored by confusion and conflict within the hard-line right.

The National Religious Party, comfortably in command of the education and transportation ministries, is plainly less than happy to leave office for the barren pastures of opposition, fearing especially that Likud and Labor – their differences now narrowed – may team up in a government of national unity.

For now, only those on the far right are saying that Netanyahu must be felled regardless of what coalition may take power in his place.

The various arguments within the leftist and rightist camps may be cut short by Netanyahu himself: Some observers believe that the prime minister, if he finds his ability to govern hamstrung by the threats of defection, may actually initiate early elections himself.

This scenario is predicated on the assessment that Netanyahu's popularity is bound to rise with the successful conclusion of the Wye accord, especially among the middle-of-the-road voters whom Barak must win over if he is to have any chance of capturing the premiership.

Certainly, it would be hard today for Labor to tar Netanyahu with the anti-peace brush with which it has grown used to painting him these past two years.

What does this mean for election tactics – whenever an election eventually takes place? And, beyond tactics, what does it mean for the evolution of Israeli politics in the long term?

So far, the 20 years of fitful peacemaking that have elapsed since the signing of the Camp David accords in September 1978 have not seriously eroded the left-right divide that cuts through Israeli politics.

Prime Minister Menachem Begin won Labor's support for the peace treaty with Egypt, but quickly lost it when he dug in his heels against autonomy talks with the Palestinians.

Subsequent Likud-led administrations have been reluctant to consider the prospect of Palestinian statehood, a prospect that many feel permeates the language and spirit of the Oslo accords.

Now, after Wye, that deep divide might at last be closing, as the Likud prime minister embraces the land-for-peace logic that lies at the heart of Oslo.

Netanyahu, at this moment, is a man in motion. He is in traumatic transit between the rightist leader of yesterday and the centrist leader of today.

The Week in Israel

Oct. 19

• Sixty-six people were wounded when two grenades were thrown at a bus in Beersheva. A lone attacker was apprehended by people on the scene. He was identified as Salem Rajab Sarsour, 29, a father of five and a resident of Hebron. Sarsour had links to Hamas. (Sarsour subsequently confessed to the August stabbing murder of Rabbi Shlomo Ra'anan in the Tel Rumeida section of Hebron, and to carrying out a grenade attack on Israeli troops on Yom Kippur.)

Oct. 20

• The Knesset announced it will supply pistols to any lawmakers who want them. The speaker of the Knesset, Dan Tichon, said he made the decision after threats were made on the lives of several lawmakers.

Oct. 21

• Israelis opposed to a peace deal protested reports of an apparent agreement being worked out at Wye Plantation. The Moledet party submitted a motion in the Knesset of no-confidence, and dozens of Jews from the territories tried to block several roads there. (The roadblocks continued for two days.)

Oct. 22

• A military court sentenced two Hamas terrorists to five life sentences plus 20 years in prison for their involvement in the murder of 11 Israelis.

Oct. 23

• Israel is developing an unmanned combat plane, according to The Military Balance, 1998-1999, a yearly publication released yesterday at the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London. As well, according to the publication, Israel became equipped this year with a self-manufactured long-range precise guided missile. It is also developing and building another photography satellite, instead of Ofek 4, which failed to go into orbit in January.

• U.S.-born Yonatan Zion Dadowitz, 32, an Israeli with links to extremist nationalist groups, was placed under arrest on suspicion of killing an Arab on the morning of May 14, and wounding five others in stabbings in north Jerusalem's religious neighborhoods.

Dispute over award to cardinal

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — A group that promotes Christian-Jewish relations has honored the archbishop of Paris for his contribution to ecumenical understanding.

The Anti-Defamation League (ADL), however, boycotted last week's event, which was sponsored by the Centre for Christian-Jewish Understanding, because, it said, Lustiger was born a Jew, and converted to Catholicism at age 14.

Lustiger apparently does not think that his baptism constituted a break with his Jewish identity.

Earlier this month, Pope John Paul II elevated Edith Stein, another Jew who converted to Catholicism, to sainthood, and described her as "an eminent daughter of Israel, and a faithful daughter of the church."

A few months ago Lustiger described himself, in a private meeting with Rabbi Joseph Ehrenkranz, the director of the Centre for Christian-Jewish Understanding, as "a fulfilled Jew."

Told that using such a term would offend Jews presenting him with the centre's Nostra Aetate Award, the cardinal pledged not to use it. The award is named for the 1960s Catholic document which recognized for the first time the legitimacy of Judaism, and ushered in a new era of interfaith dialogue.

Rabbi Rene-Samuel Sirat, who has served both as the chief rabbi of France and the grand rabbi of Europe, was also honored with the award.

For some Jewish leaders, using polite language does not change the reality of the cardinal's syncretic view of his faith.

"I respect his decision of conscience and faith" to convert to Christianity, said Abraham Foxman, ADL's national director.

"It would be fine to have him speak at a conference or colloquium," he said, "but it's inappropriate for a Jewish organization to honor him."

While the centre is run by a rabbi and supported substantially by Jewish contributors, it is not technically a Jewish organization. It is housed on the campus of Sacred Heart University in Fairfield, Conn., a Catholic institution.

Then known by his birth name, Aron Lustiger had just become bar mitzvah as the Nazi era took hold, and he and his sister were sent by their mother to live with a Catholic family in Orleans, France, for safety.

His mother perished in Auschwitz.

The young man, whose upbringing was devoid of all but the most minimal Jewish practice, became enamored of the family who gave him haven and saved his life, said Ehrenkranz.

Soon after that, at age 14, Aron was baptized and became Jean-Marie.

Jean-Marie Lustiger

"I don't fault him for converting as a young man who had nothing," Ehrenkranz said.

"It's a problem with a lot of young Jewish people today. They are searching for something, and nobody's ever given them any Jewish spirituality or content, so they turn to Buddhism and other religions."

Fourteen years after converting, Lustiger was ordained a Catholic priest and began working as a chaplain at the Sorbonne in Paris.

In 1979, he was appointed the bishop of Orleans, and just two years later, archbishop of Paris. He was named cardinal in 1983.

He has made a valuable contribution to Jewish-Catholic dialogue, say those involved in interreligious affairs, for reasons that seem at least partly rooted in his Jewish lineage.

A close associate of the Pope, he is considered to have been instrumental in getting the Carmelite nuns to finally vacate their convent on the edges of the Auschwitz death camp in 1993.

He was also centrally involved in a document issued last year by the French Bishops Conference titled The Declaration of Repentance.

In it, the Catholic church leaders of France took responsibility for "failing to lend their aid" to the Jews under Nazi persecution. "We beg God's pardon and we call upon the Jewish people to hear our words of repentance," they wrote.

"Lustiger has had enormous impact on his fellow cardinals," said Rabbi A. James Rudin, director of interreligious affairs for the American Jewish Committee.

Still, Lustiger has confronted opposition before from the Jewish community. When he visited Israel a couple of years ago, Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau condemned him as a "traitor to his people."

Lustiger clearly remains devoted to what he considers both parts of his identity. In his speech accepting the award, he called on Catholics in France and New York to go to church on Holocaust Memorial Day, or Yom HaShoah, "in the spirit of penance and as an act of faith in the Lord of the living and the dead."

Spousal Support: Case Comment

(Bracklow v. Bracklow [1997] B.C. J 1376 (B.C.C.A)

Are all spouses entitled to support when the marriage did not create an economic disadvantage to such spouses? In Bracklow v. Bracklow, B.C.'s Family Relations Act was interpreted to mean that if no financial dependency was created by the marriage, then there should be no claim for spousal support. In a case to be decided by the Supreme Court of Canada this fall, the parties were previously married. They commenced living together in 1985, got married in 1987, and separated in 1992.

Support contingent on dependency

The "wife" suffered from different kinds of illnesses before, during and after the cohabitation and marriage. Although her illnesses worsened during the course of their relationship, there was no causal link between the marriage and her illnesses.

The trial judge found that the marriage was not a traditional one, especially since each spouse made equal financial contributions to the marriage. No support was ordered and the British Columbia Court of Appeal dismissed the wife's appeal for such support. It ruled that the B.C. legislation did not provide for support just because the partners lived together or were married. There is nothing about cohabitation/marriage in this case that disadvantaged the wife; no dependency was created as a result of the cohabitation.

The question now put to the Supreme Court of Canada by the wife who appeals is this: Should the Court extend or change the principles covering spousal support as recited in Moge so that spousal support should be provided in all marriages were a spouse is in need, even if the marriage did not create that need or dependency? Is the marriage certificate itself becoming a type of "insurance policy", as suggested by Cristen Schmitz in the article Spousal Support Case Tops SCC Agenda? [1]

Beyond mere legality

I would argue that such a question is of such importance that for the Court to answer it would take the Court beyond merely interpreting either British Columbia's Family Relations Act or Canada's Divorce Act. The language of the relevant sections in such statutes may be too restrictive to permit the type of interpretation that the wife would have the Court provide.

More importantly, the Supreme Court would likely be attempting to legislate critical social policy rather than interpret legislation, which is not its mandate. If a province or the country is to extend the provision of spousal support beyond the dependency caused by economic detriment in a marriage, then surely Canadians as whole, through their elected representatives, must be consulted. Given the high rate of divorce in Canada, we can safely say that only one half of marriages endure. Surely if we are to make spousal support so much more widely available, then such decisions should best be made by our legislators, whether or not politicians wish to handle this "hot potato".

Onus on elected representatives

Artists study Holocaust from cultural perspective

By DOROTHY LICHTBLAU
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Participants in a two-day program of performances, readings and lectures, The Holocaust: A Cultural Perspective, will study whether an era can be truthfully depicted after the demise of those who lived it.

The performances, to be held Oct. 31 and Nov. 1, were devised by the Cultural Arts Group at the Bloor JCC for Holocaust Education Week.

Among those participating are fiction writer and essayist Richard Teleky, who will read from his first novel The Paris Years of Rosie Kamirr; Allen and Karen Kaeja, artistic directors of Kaeja d'Dance, who will present their new work Resistance; scholar and educator Dr. Eli Pfefferkorn, author of the play Virtual Reality; and Judith Kalman a short story writer, who will read from her book The Country of Birches.

"What I wanted, was not to be factually accurate, but to be true to the emotions and emotional effects," says Kalman.

Search for identity

In The Country of Birches, we are introduced to Dana Weisz, who in 1956, flees Hungary with her family, stops in England for a couple of years and then winds up in suburban Montreal. These stories about dislocation and the search for identity parallel Kalman's own life, but they reach beyond relaying information. Embedded in her stories are the accounts of her survivor parents.

Significant, is the revelation that Kalman's father returned to his home farm after the war to find that his wife, their child, his parents and his siblings had all perished in concentration camps. And though Kalman's writing primarily contends with being a child in a strange land, it also discloses what it means to be a descendent of parents who went through extreme loss, while questioning how ordinary people can endure great travails and then somehow assume a seemingly normal life.

"My book also asks how to live with the past when the past is so dark. How did my parents start again? I could never resolve that," she says.

Kalman's book weaves personal memory with received testimony into a tapestry that not only reveals the journey of a family, but what may occur to any people who have faced genocide. Furthermore, she shows the intergenerational effects of that trauma.

A self-proclaimed assimilated Jew, Kalman asserts that she felt compelled to write about the experiences of Jewish refugees of the '50s and '60s. The stories were ingrained in her bones, she says. Consequently, she believes that the Holocaust years must be remembered, since it is through memory that lives are reclaimed. Holding memory, means one does not enter the future empty handed.

Kaeja d'Dance will present their new work Resistance.

Kaeja also was driven to convey what happened during the Holocaust, he says, but his stories are expressed through movement.

Like Kalman, Kaeja's father lost his wife, child and parental family during the war. For many years, however, his father would not talk about those events. "I remember when I was about 17 or 18, setting up an appointment with my father, sitting him down and questioning him about the war, because I had no idea [about his experiences] and I needed to know," says Kaeja.

Five years after the birth of the Kaeja's oldest daughter, Allen Kaeja realized that the Holocaust was haunting him. The discovery led him to develop dances based on his father's life just before and during World War II. In Blood, a portrayal of a relationship between brothers, is fundamentally about Kaeja's father and the sibling who died in his arms during the war.

Later, Kaeja created Sarah, a story which envisions what occurred to his father's first wife after she was transported to another camp. In 1995, Kaeja began The

BY BILL GLADSTONE

ISRAELI HOTELS CATCH MILLENNIUM FEVER

Israel's Ministry of Tourism is in the midst of a crash program to create 10,000 additional tourist beds for an unprecedented wave of visitors expected for the Christian millennium in the year 2000.

Israeli tourist officials are forecasting that some four million visitors will arrive in the Holy Land from the autumn of 1999 to the winter of 2000, compared with the roughly 2.3 million visitors that arrived last year.

Consequently, investors are pouring more than $350 million (US) to improve the country's tourist infrastructure.

Much of the effort is being concentrated on building new moderately-priced hotel rooms, especially in and around Jerusalem, where an estimated 3,000 new hotel rooms are in preparation. Because it takes too long to build new hotels, hundreds of private homes are being converted to bed and breakfast facilities and numerous kibbutzim are adding guest houses.

Israel plans to increase landing capacity at Ben-Gurion International Airport by 30 percent and streamline the procedures through which new arrivals are processed. As well, aviation officials are taking a closer look at existing smaller airports in northern Israel as alternatives to Ben-Gurion.

Three years ago, at a time when optimism was high in the Middle East as a result of the Rabin peace initiatives, Israeli officials were confidently predicting five million visitors for the year 2000. In light of the subsequent derailing of the peace process, that estimate was reduced by 20 percent.

However, there's no telling what the figure might eventually be. A lot depends upon whether Pope John Paul II, during the millennial year, will make good on his long-standing commitment to visit Israel.

Israel's Minister of Tourism Moshe Katsav, who recently met with the pontiff, is optimistic about a papal trip to the Middle East for 2000. If it occurs, a papal visit could draw even more Christian tourists to Israel.

Still, after being disappointed in their expectations for the Israel at 50 campaign, Israeli tourism officials are wise not to indulge in excessive optimism. Ugly geopolitical realities have had a strange and unfortunate way of intruding into the most sunny tourism prognostications of previous years.

Canaan and Ancient Israel: A new permanent exhibition dedicated to the archeology of ancient Israel and neighboring lands opened this month at the University of Pennsylvania Museum of Archaeology and Anthropology, Philadelphia.

The Canaan and Ancient Israel exhibit features more than 500 rare ancient artifacts dating from roughly 3000 to 500 BCE, principally excavated by museum archeologists in Israel, Jordan and Lebanon. Objects include pottery, statuary, inscribed jar handles and seals, weapons and weights, personal objects of gold and ivory, semi-precious stones and carved faces from sarcophagi.

University archeologists and a few others uncovered nearly 15,000 ancient artifacts from Bible Lands between 1921 and 1981.

The museum is located at 33rd and Spruce streets, Philadelphia. 215-898-4000.

Artist's images connect at emotional-sensual level

Old Country Trilogy. The first two parts of the work are Zummel and Court Yard, which examine the dissolution of a community, and what happens to people imprisoned in a ghetto. Resistance, the last part of the trilogy, returns to choice and hope. Excerpts of this new piece will be performed at the Bloor JCC Holocaust Education event.

Kaeja feels too, that he wants to tell these stories through images that connect with the emotional-sensual levels. He employs metaphor to take himself, performers and viewers on a learning journey which leads to catharsis.

According to Pfefferkorn, when teaching the arts, "you have to find the metaphor which is both familiar and alien. Familiar in order to enable the reader or listener to make contact with the experience, and alien to indicate that one has entered the land of the grotesque…"

A child survivor who was brought to England after the war, he eventually became a student of theatre. "Drama is an underlying human experience," he says. "We're just not always aware of it."

While in the United States on a Fulbright scholarship, he applied this concept to design Holocaust curricula using drama and stories.

"Empirically we can't reconstruct an experience. We can reconstruct the spirit of an experience …through metaphor. If you're a good storyteller you can convey it better than fact."

He suggests that young people be introduced to the Holocaust years gradually through symbols and images. In this way, the youngsters won't be shut down by the weight of the material, yet they will assimilate it in a profound way.

At the same time, Pfefferkorn warns that we must guard against distortion, denial and the watering down of events. We cannot reduce that era to only another instance of inhumanity, because then we deny the depth and particularity of those years. Through generalization, we depersonalize those who perished, and make them nameless and faceless. From victims' acts of courage during a time of terror we can, however, extrapolate what it means when the world loses its soul.

We must remember the Holocaust, Pfefferkorn says, "because for democracies, it is a lesson that might prepare societies for facing economic and political crises without going under and turning back to the Middle Ages."

He adds that the lessons of the Holocaust are important to Jews, but just as valuable to other nations since, "Hitler's dark design" intended to subvert the entire Western world.

FILM SET IN HOLOCAUST IS "SWEET & FUNNY"

Italian stand-up comic and film maker Roberto Benigni has received much acclaim and media attention of late for his film La Vita e Bella (Life Is Beautiful), which won the Grand Jury Prize at Cannes this year and the People's Choice Award this season at both the Toronto and Montreal film festivals.

A recent profile on Benigni in the New York Times Magazine ("The Funniest Italian You've Probably Never Heard Of," Oct. 11) called him "Italy's Robin Williams" and described his latest film, a comedy set in the Holocaust, in glowing terms.

The film focuses on Guido, an Italian Jew who is deported with his 5-year-old son to a German concentration camp, where he tries to convince the boy that their horrific surroundings are part of an elaborate game.

Life Is Beautiful took Israel by storm, so much so that Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert gave Benigni a medal of recognition. The film, which recently opened in the United States, is expected to be a contender for Best Foreign Language Film at next year's Oscar ceremonies.

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival is screening this "sweet and funny fairy tale romance" as a fund-raising event, Oct. 28, 7:30 p.m. at the York Cinema, 101 Eglinton Ave. E. Tickets $25 include post-film party at the nearby Shark City Athletic Club. 324-8600.

Experts examine economic outlook

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Anyone expecting a hot stock tip or anything more than general advice for these uncertain economic times probably came away from a recent UJA Federation event a little disappointed.

Economist Peter Drake and portfolio manager Jonathan Goodman did provide outlines of the risks associated with the current bear market, and they did explain why world markets have headed south recently, but neither went out on a limb to suggest specific investments in the months ahead.

Instead, their advice to 100 eager investment acolytes was much broader. "Get in the habit of learning... You don't have any choice," said Drake, vice-president and deputy chief economist for the Toronto-Dominion Economic Group. Learn to live with globalization and accept only those risks that allow you to sleep at night, he told a gathering of the young business and young professionals networks of UJA Federation.

Goodman, vice-president of Goodman and Company, also cast his gaze at the global stage, noting how current economic difficulties "started as a currency crisis, turned into the Asian flu and became the global economic crisis."

Speaking soon after the U.S. Federal Reserve Board dropped interest rates by one-quarter of a percentage point, Goodman said, "It was the first time in four years that the Fed [did so] without a public discussion." He speculated that "there's a problem out there that we don't know about but will learn about" soon enough.

Turning from macro-economics to the micro scale, Goodman said that in today's "high risk market," cash is a tremendous asset to hold in a portfolio. "It allows you to buy at great values when things go down."

His firm is "building a shopping list" by "valuating businesses, doing our homework, seeing how much a company is worth and waiting for opportunities. A stock well bought is a stock well owned," he said.

"This is not a good market to hit home runs. We're looking to hit singles."

Goodman declined to get more specific, but when he was asked if the stock market had hit bottom, he predicted it could fall another 10 percent.

Drake discounted suggestions the world could be entering another depression like the one triggered by the 1929 stock market crash, though "one learns never to say never."

An important difference today is that world leaders acknowledge the existence of a global economy. Unlike the situation in the 1930s, world economic leaders are priming the pump of their national economies and not shutting the door to trade, he said.

In Canada, the economy is expected to grow at a rate of 1.5 percent in 1998 and one percent in 1999, according to Toronto Dominion economists, Drake added.

Play explores family conflicts

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

The Waltonsteins, a one-woman play by Vancouver-based writer/performer Frannie Sheridan, is being presented Nov. 2 at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The play, which has been variously dubbed a "traumady of errors" and "an incredible story," is a comedy/drama based on Sheridan's real-life family story. Their Holocaust survivor parents raised her and her six brothers and sisters to hide their Jewishness and pretend to be Christian.

Sheridan's father, an established and respected eye doctor, changed the family's name from Sigal to Sheridan, and had the entire family converted to Roman Catholicism.

"My parents believed that to tell anyone we were Jewish equated with death," Sheridan said.

Although the Sheridans/Waltonsteins feared that another Holocaust was just over the horizon, the family was a war zone rather than a buffer against the outside world. Father and mother fought incessantly (in Yiddish), using their children as pawns in their never-ending battles.

The first performance of The Waltonsteins took place in Vancouver in August 1995. Since then, it has been performed more than 25 times in Canada and the United States.

Sheridan said The Waltonsteins started out as personal therapy. "The play is about a young woman's journey through life, the obstacles she encounters and how she deals with them by going back to her roots and ultimately finding out the truth about her heritage and telling the truth."

Sheridan called The Waltonsteins a family story that most people, both Jewish and non-Jewish, will be able to relate to.

"The play touches on everyone's family experiences and unresolved family conflicts," she said. "It encourages people to examine their own family situations."

The one-woman production is spare, with the stage bare except for lighting design. "The play is relatively set and prop free," Sheridan said. "The stark and bare environment gives me the freedom to create the play within the audience's imagination."

Over the past three years, the play has evolved. "Now it's a more professional gig, a play," the 36-year-old said. "I still find it challenging and I love doing it. Personally, I find my performances hugely rewarding, and I know many people in the audience get a lot out of the play as well."

Paul Kyle, a West Vancouver art dealer and "Frannie's biggest fan," said he was deeply affected by The Waltonsteins.

"It's very emotional and also incredibly entertaining at the same time," Kyle noted. "I felt the full gamut of emotions, and I'm not easily moved to tears."

When the play was first presented, Sheridan's family was so terrified about being "outed" as Jews that they threatened her with legal action.

Over time, however, their feelings about the play have mellowed. "Some of my siblings and their families have seen the play, and it has changed their lives," Sheridan said. "Many of them are now exploring their Jewish roots. They're learning Hebrew, attending conversion courses, going to synagogue." Sheridan's father, who lives today in his native Vienna, has returned to Judaism.

"It's important to be proud of who you are," Sheridan said. "If my story can evoke a feeling of pride, that's good."

The Toronto performance is sponsored by the Israel Cancer Research Fund. After its Toronto performance, The Waltonsteins moves to Ottawa (Nov. 7 to 9), Waterloo (Nov. 13) and Vancouver (Nov. 15 and 16)

The Waltonsteins is co-written by Lynna Goldhar-Smith, and is currently being workshopped by director Michelle Porter. Original music is by Laurie Lesk and lighting design by Kerrene John.

A feature film based on the play, with Sheridan playing the role of her mother, is currently in the development stage. The film will be directed by Edmonton-born director Arthur Hiller, who directed Love Story.

Pianist shines thanks to strong family support

By LORI FIREMAN
Special to The CJN

Ori Friedman

VAUGHAN — To those who've seen the movie Shine, the term piano prodigy instantly connotes the image of Geoffrey Rush as David Helfgott, a once-great musician reduced to a stuttering shell of a man exhausted by the pressures of early success, and a father unwilling to let go.

Happily, Ori Friedman is no David Helfgott. That they are both pianists and of rich Jewish heritage appears to be where the resemblance starts and ends.

"Helfgott had conflicts at home...His father did not support him...My father and family have gone out of their way for me," Friedman says.

As Gabriel Friedman looks on, there can be no doubt that this is true. Interviewing Ori is as much an interview with his father, as the violinist and music teacher eagerly details his son's many accomplishments.

At the age of 15, Ori has already received international acclaim, having performed with numerous orchestras in the United States, and at such esteemed galas as a tribute to Broadway legend Kitty Carlisle-Hart, an AIDS benefit by designer Pierre Cardin, and a special occasion honoring Maestro Isaac Stern.

He has the distinction of being one of the youngest pianists to have recorded a CD, and with only six years of piano studies, has earned a full scholarship to the Juilliard School pre-college program in New York, where he is currently being taught by Yoheved Kaplinsky, the chair of the piano department.

His scholarship, the Chalmers Performing Arts Training Grant is rarely given to such a young musician.

Ori's original desire was not to be a pianist, but a ballet dancer, and he was successful enough to be accepted, like his younger sister Natalie, to the National Ballet School of Canada. On his switch from dance to piano, Ori says, "I suppose I always had the rhythm inside me. I was just unsure how to express my love for music."

'I always had the rhythm inside me'

A gifted scholar, Ori skipped Grade 1 and left Yorkhill Public School to attend the Independent Learning Centre, where he can work more productively and accommodate his busy touring schedule.

"Piano is fun," he says. "Satisfaction with my playing is what's important."

Ori recently won a competition to perform Rhapsody in Blue at the Avery Fisher Hall with the Little Orchestra Society in New York to honor George Gershwin's birthday and New York's centenary.

He is thrilled, he says, about his upcoming performance at Vaughan's City Playhouse. His program will include, among others, pieces by Beethoven and Chopin, and Ori welcomes the opportunity "to be able to share what I've learned with the friends and family who have always supported me."

Ori performs at the City Playhouse located on 1000 New Westminster Drive (and Bathurst). Tickets obtained at 905-709-4057, or call Ticket Master.

Government cutbacks seen as hurting medicare

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Medicare in Canada is deteriorating as a result of government funding cuts and privatization of health services, a rally of 350 seniors was told

Among the 16 organizations sponsoring the rally at North York Memorial Hall were the Association of Jewish Seniors (AJS) and the Bernard Betel Centre. Al Gorlick of AJS was chair.

"Your system is underfunded, and privatization is a bizarre route to take because it leads to huge profits for a few powerful people," said Dr. David Himmelstein of Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass., who recounted abuses of private medical plans in the United States.

The issue was presented to the rally in stark, human terms by three women who gave personal testimony about how hospitals and the medical system had failed them.

Rita Deunisch-Turner of AJS recounted the story of her friend and neighbor, identified only as Ron. He was "dehumanized" by the system, she said, and he was only allowed into a hospital – and not his first choice – when she, Deunisch-Turner, agreed to use her credit card to pay up front.

The friend, a noted radiation scientist, was given a powerful drug that caused diarrhea and sent home with a prescription that cost $300, could only be filled in hospital and was not covered by the Ontario Health Insurance Plan.

In this case, she related, the patient was sent home by ambulance from the hospital and left alone, even though she had left her name and telephone number to be informed in case of emergency.

"He vowed he would not return to hospital and he chose to die at home. And it was a blessing when he died," said Deunisch-Turner.

Helen Heeney said that "superbugs" which did not respond to antibiotics invaded her hospital room, because the carpets had not been vacuumed for 10 days. Her hospital stay for 10 days turned into a "nightmare" because of the superbugs and the fact that cuts had eliminated the housekeeping department.

Heart patient Dorothy McKinnon said there was no angiogram facility in her hospital, and she had to wait 14 days to have one in a hospital across the street. She suffered a massive hemorrhage as a result of having been given blood thinning drugs, was sent back to her original hospital, given the wrong medicine and put in a windowless room in intensive care.

Finally, after 22 days in hospital, she was operated on at the hospital across the street. It took her four months to recover.

"It's a myth that Canada has the best medical system in the world," she said. "When I needed the system most it let me down."

A two-tier system that rewards the rich and punishes the poor will result from present trends, moderator Bruce Mutch, president of Canadian Pensioners Concerned, warned the audience.

"Health care is in deep trouble, with the support of the provincial government and the tacit approval of the federal government," said Patricia Spindel, a Humber College professor of social sciences.

"It's a scandal the way the Ontario government has hoodwinked the public. It's time to send the Harris government back to the stone age from whence they came," Spindel said.

"Ageist thinking" at Queen's Park has led to disability services and payments being made available for young people but not for seniors, she said, citing the case of a woman who was given $10,000 to $15,000 to cover services for her son, but nothing for her husband, who was suffering from the same non-genetic disability.

Community Access Councils set up by the Ontario government are running out of funds and are a convenient method for the government to avoid responsibility for the situation affecting seniors, Spindel said.

Most of the $1 billion set aside by the Ontario government for long-term care beds will go to private corporations, she predicted.

Fully one-third of the health system in Ontario is already privatized, said lawyer and health care activist Amani Oakley. "There is no proof that the private sector can do things cheaper than the public sector," she said.

She told the story of a Baltimore man who died waiting for a liver transplant, even though one was available. The insurance company would not pay for it, Oakley said. "I don't want to live in a country with such a lack of care."

Councillor Michael Feldman brought greetings from Mayor Mel Lastman who was in China.

New migraine drug approved

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Zomig, a drug that studies have shown to be both quick acting and effective against migraines, has recently been approved for use in Canada.

The announcement was made at a press conference held recently at the King Edward Hotel in downtown Toronto.

Migraine is a biological disorder, involving a complicated relationship between the blood supply to the brain and its nerve network. Symptoms may include one-sided head throbbing pain, sensitivity to light, sound and smell, nausea and vomiting, aura, impaired vision, flashing lights, weakness or numbness.

It tends to run in families, but attacks may be triggered by such factors as stress, diet (such as chocolate, cheese or caffeine), weather, hormonal changes and cerebral dysfunctions.

Emily Levitt, communications manager of The Migraine Association of Canada, described it as "a hammering and throbbing – it is not just another headache. Someone told me it was like a creature inside his head trying to get out of his eye."

Zomig (zolmitriptan, made by Zeneca Pharma) constricts the dilated blood vessels, decreases inflammation and appears to work in the brain stem, which transfers pain to the deeper parts of the brain, according to Dr. Alan Rapoport, director of the New England Centre for Headache in Stamford, Conn.

Rapoport carried out one of the most extensive clinical trials of the drug.

Dr. Gary Shapero, medical director of the Markham Headache and Pain Treatment Centre, who was also involved in the clinical trials of Zomig, said that over three million Canadians, nearly 17 percent of the population, suffer from migraines. It is two and a half times more frequent in women, especially those between 21 and 50, he said, explaining that it frequently is connected with the menstrual cycle. For some reason, Canada, he said, has proportionately one of the highest percentages of sufferers.

The effects go beyond the individual: "71 percent report cancellations of social activities, 51 percent of business activities, and 34 percent say that their holidays have been ruined."

Shapero said that the economic impact is staggering, both in direct costs, such as visits to doctors and hospitals and drugs, as well as in the indirect cost of lost productivity, since migraines can last from two hours to several days.

While there are other drugs available to help migraines, the most notable recent one being Imitrex, Zomig has been shown in clinical trials to meet both physician and patient needs, said Rapoport.

His research shows that it is effective in about 65 percent of the patients who tried it, a significant improvement from Imitrex, which works in about 51 percent of cases. Nearly 95 percent of those report complete success.

He found that while there is usually rapid relief in anywhere from 35 to 40 minutes up to 2 hours, it is effective when taken at any time during the attack, and continues to be effective for future ones.

"It is one of the best tolerated migraine medicines today," Rapoport said, noting that "none of my patients stopped taking it because of side effects."

Zomig is easy to use, he said, explaining that a person with migraine takes a 2.5 milligram tablet as soon as he or she realizes that a migraine is in progress (this is unlike most migraine medications that must be taken at the onset of symptoms). The patient may need another tablet two hours later, and, if the migraine recurs, one more. Cost is $12.95 per pill, a little bit less than other migraine drugs such as Imitrex and Sumatryptin.

Israeli windsurfer named European champion

By SIMON GRIVER
Special to The CJN

HAIFA — For Israeli Amit Inbar, the past year has been like a new beginning.

A former Israeli windsurfing champion, Inbar had retired in 1996 after failing to qualify for the Olympic Games. But after he had taken an extended vacation in northern India, the lure of top flight competition proved too strong and he returned to Israel in 1997 to make a comeback.

Last July, his comeback was complete when he was named European windsurfing champion.

Inbar has now set his sights on an Olympic medal in the Sydney Games in 2000.

"I really missed the sea and all the excitement of competition when I was in the mountains of India," said the 26-year-old windsurfer. "Of course I missed Israel and my family too, but then I expected to get homesick. Even when I'm away competing for a few weeks, it feels wonderful to get back to Israel. I feel like a tourist discovering a new country."

Amit Inbar

Inbar is as amphibious as any human being is ever likely to be. He grew up in Michmoret, a village on the coast midway between Tel Aviv and Haifa that is famous for its naval high school, "and the family house is less than 100 metres from the sea," he said.

He still lives at home with his parents, Danny and Vered, both kibbutz-born and bred. Tall, dark and handsome and with an athlete's slim, muscular physique, Inbar has a relaxed, open manner, and he makes no attempt to hide his resentment when he recalls his childhood, which he describes as obsessively competitive.

"My brother Eran, who is three years older than me, was Israel's leading young windsurfer," he explained. "A the age of nine, my parents decided that I had to learn windsurfing to provide him with some competition. I hated it."

Gradually Inbar mastered the art of windsurfing and by the time he won his first major competition several years later, his attitude had completely changed.

"I soon found that winning was very intoxicating," he recalled. "I was hooked."

Windsurfing, he explained, is a cross between surfing and sailing. "Basically, you have a surfboard with sails attached. You have to understand the winds and currents and be very fit and strong if you want to become a champion."

As he entered his teens, Inbar began finding it increasingly easy to beat his older brother.

"They were very tough years at home," he said. "There was a charged atmosphere in the house. Basically the Israeli surfboarding championship was always a fight between my brother and myself. Before competitions, both of us would be tense. Afterward one of us would be elated and the other depressed.

"Fortunately, we fundamentally had a good relationship," Inbar stressed. "By the time I was 19, I was nearly always beating Eran. One day I suggested he retire and become my trainer. To my surprise, he accepted."

With Eran complementing him rather than competing against him, Inbar enjoyed his greatest success. Nevertheless, he finished a disappointing eighth at the Barcelona Olympics in 1992. "I was very young and inexperienced and made a lot of foolish mistakes."

In 1994, he reached the pinnacle of sporting achievement when he won the World Championship, becoming one of only a handful of Israelis ever to win a world title in any sport. He also won the European Championship in 1995.

"It was a fantastic feeling to be the world champion," Inbar said. "But if it is difficult to win a world championship, it is even more difficult to stay at the top."

By 1996, Inbar's world had fallen apart. He finished eighth in the world championships held in Haifa and lost out to local rival Gal Friedman, who finished second in Haifa, and became Israel's lone sailboarding representative in Atlanta. Friedman went on to finish third, becoming only the third-ever Israeli to win an Olympic medal.

"I was not jealous of Gal," insisted Inbar. "In fact, we are very good friends. I'm not the jealous type. I'm more concerned about my own performance and I was not performing very well, so I decided to retire."

Inbar was able to reflect on the sport in India and he realized how much he missed the sea and windsurfing. Perhaps most importantly, he was able to put his childhood resentment behind him. He knew now that he was doing it because he wanted to, not because his parents had forced him to. This self-knowledge gave him a new appetite for training.

"I train for many hours, seven days a week," he said, "mainly in the early morning and later afternoon. I'm actually on the water for only a few hours a day. The rest of the time I'm running, exercising and body-building. Each race is 12 kilometres long and lasts several hours. You have to be very strong physically to maintain your balance and adjust the sail."

Inbar spends much of his time at major international competitions. "My major worry at present is economic. In the past, I was sponsored by Bank Hapoalim and Swatch, but due to the present recession in Israel, they have withdrawn their sponsorship. I receive a small salary from the Israel Olympic Committee (IOC) but for the most part, I'm subsidizing competition from my own savings."

Despite his financial difficulties, it all feels worthwhile when he stands on the winners' platform, as he did in July after he won the European Championship in Marathon, Greece – even though he finished behind local favorite Nikos Kakalmanakis, the Olympic gold medalist. But, "he cheated," Inbar said, and the result was appealed to the judges.

"He consulted with his trainer during the race from a radio he had concealed on his board. Ten other competitors were witness to this. I don't mind being beaten, but only if it's within the rules."

Inbar admits he would dearly love to win an Olympic medal. "But the year 2000 is still a long way off," he observed. "First of all, I have to focus on the upcoming World Championship later this year in Brest, France. It is based on my performance in that championship that the IOC will decide whether to send me or Gal Friedman."

Looking farther into the future, Inbar suggests he could participate in two more Olympics before retiring. And then what?

"I'd like to study, maybe subjects like nutrition or psychology. I already have an understanding of these two disciplines because they are such an important component of my sport."

He and his girlfriend, Dana, have been dating for three years but have no plans to marry. "I would like to have my own family when I retire from windsurfing," Inbar said.

"And one thing I know – I won't make my children compete when they're very young. Unless of course they want to," he added with a smile.

Fencers impress expert

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Fencing master Ernest Meister doesn't get impressed easily, but he was mightily impressed with the performance of the Israeli fencing team at the recently concluded World Championships in La Chaux de Fonde, Switzerland.

Meister, former coach of the Canadian and Romanian national teams, attended the championships, and said he was surprised by the Israelis' technical proficiency and determination among the male and female fencers both.

"They had a lot of heart, They fought like lions," he said.

The women in particular, impressed him, finishing 16th in the team event, ahead of Canada, Sweden and Denmark. The men finished 14th, ahead of Canada, Britain, Japan, Portugal, Australia, Denmark and Holland.

The Israeli teams have a tremendous future in world fencing. "They have very strong footwork, and they work very fast. Their temperament is very important. It's a very hot temperament. They fight for every hit," Meister said.

Unfortunately, he continued, they receive little financial assistance from the Israeli government. For more information, Meister can be reached at 663-7971.

The Inside Back

Out of the Cold – interfaith style

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

The book of Job tells us that "no stranger need lodge in the street." Leviticus and Deuteronomy say the stranger should be treated with kindness and generosity. In fact, the word stranger is mentioned some 70 times in the Bible. Now, I'm not knowledgeable enough to know how the stranger is regarded by the Muslim, Buddhist and Zoroastrian faiths, but I suspect it is with similar sentiments.

It's against this multi-faith backdrop that four very different houses of worship are embarking on a new path: welcoming the homeless as the newest partners in Toronto's decade-old Out of the Cold program.

Anyone familiar with the west side of Bayview Avenue just north of Steeles has had to notice a kind of religious shopping strip: just south of Temple Har Zion is the Jaffari Islamic Centre (famously, the two buildings share a parking lot); a little further south is the Cham Shan Chinese Buddhist Temple, a magnificent structure that is home to several monks and nuns. A bit south of Steeles, nestled in a wooded area, is the Zoroastrian Society of Ontario, whose adherents follow a faith that evolved in eastern Iran hundreds of years before the common era.

All four are about to join hands in feeding and sheltering (for a night) the shamefully growing number of homeless in Toronto. Temple Har Zion will be the host every Wednesday night in December (Temple Kol Ami will provide some of the volunteers); the Zoroastrian temple takes over from January to February; and the mosque will be the venue for February to the end of March. The Buddhist temple has made a financial contribution to the project.

This is an effort filled with "nons": Non-denominational, non-judgmental and non-threatening. "Guests," as they are called, will be shuttled to and from the Finch subway. The program provides TTC tokens.

At Har Zion, up to 35 guests will be fed a hot supper, and 16 will spend the night on thin mattresses. Clothing will also be proffered, as will a cold breakfast and a bag lunch.

Those who attended a community information meeting at the temple last week voiced concerns that by now are familiar: Are the homeless dangerous? Do they spread disease? Will they present a danger to students at the temple's day school?

"It's OK to worry. It's OK to have concerns," assured Freda Muscovitch, founding chair of the Out of the Cold program at Holy Blossom Temple, where the project has been a smashing success since 1995.

An array of health and security experts allayed concerns: the homeless are rarely dangerous; the risk of catching a disease from them is negligible; and they will be gone by the time students arrive in the morning.

What the homeless are, the panel indirectly agreed, is simply out of luck. Many are educated and able. Of course, some do abuse alcohol and drugs, and according to one study, two-thirds have been treated for a psychiatric disorder at some point in their lives. But Holy Blossom has found there's nothing to fear, and everything to gain.

Last winter, I attended an evening at Holy Blossom, and rarely have I encountered a crowd so well-mannered and, in a way, dignified. The volunteers who cook, serve food and mingle with the guests come away vastly enriched by the experience.

The Out of the Cold program now tallies dozens of churches, and with the addition of Temple Har Zion, four synagogues: In addition to Holy Blossom, Darchei Noam is partnering with a downtown church, and the First Narayaver is doing the same with a coalition of area churches.

Earlier this month, I interviewed "Rachel," a Jewish woman who had been homeless for a year before social worker Lillian Freedman found her an apartment (CJN, Oct. 22). It wasn't easy meeting Rachel. She was wracked with pain and suffering. She hurt, body and soul. That night, I yelled at my kids for arguing over a Nintendo game.

I wish everyone could meet Rachel.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

My sister died suddenly three months ago and my 75-year-old mother cannot stop crying. She falls apart at the slightest thing. She also does not go to see her friends or do all the things she used to do. She was a very active woman. My other sister and I are quite concerned, but as mother lives with me, I am bearing the brunt of the problem. I am becoming more concerned as mother is eating less and less at every meal.

Concerned for Mother

Dear Concerned for Mother,

It is probably a good idea to have the doctor check your mother's physical status regularly. You should accompany her, and perhaps both you and the doctor could encourage her to consider either a bereavement support group or individual counseling to help her work through her grief. It is likely that this is playing a key role in the appearance of her depressive symptoms and should be addressed as soon as possible.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal

What are you laughing at?

Eighty five year old Bessie Goldberg bursts into the rec room of the men's retirement home. She holds her clenched fist in the air and announces, "Anyone who can guess what's in my hand can have sex with me tonight!!!"

An elderly gentleman in the rear shouts out, "An elephant?"

Bessie thinks a minute and says, "Close enough."

At the height of a political corruption trial, the prosecuting attorney attacked a witness.

"Isn't it true," he bellowed, "that you accepted five thousand dollars to compromise this case?" The witness stared out the window, as though he hadn't heard the question.

"Isn't it true that you accepted five thousand dollars to compromise this case?" the lawyer repeated. The witness still did not respond.

Finally, the judge leaned over and said, "Sir, please answer the question."

"Oh," the startled witness said, "I thought he was talking to you."

CHANGING LIVES

Jaqlin Walters

When you give to UJA,

where will your money go?

Ask Jaqlin, Tamar or Evelyn.

The Bernard Betel Centre, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, restored hope, comfort and friendship to 80 year old Evelyn Rabkin, whose life had been derailed by tragedy and illness. An Israel Experience program, subsidized by UJA Federation, attached teenager Jaqlin Walters to her Jewish past. Now, for the first time, she dreams of a fully Jewish future. The Jewish Agency, supported by the world-wide UJA Federation movement, allowed Tamar Pichkhadze to escape the instability of Tbilisi, in the former Soviet republic of Georgia.

Israel, U.S. sign strategic pact

Deterrence against long range missiles, unconventional weapons

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel and the United States have signed a new strategic memorandum of understanding aimed at strengthening Israel's deterrence capacity against the threat of long-range missiles and unconventional weapons.

President Bill Clinton and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu separately signed the memorandum of agreement (MOA) last weekend. The MOA promises that the United States will "enhance Israel's defensive and deterrent capabilities" against threats of ballistic missiles, and will upgrade the strategic and military cooperation between them.

The MOA, the first signed between the two countries in a decade, also calls for "upgrading the framework of the U.S.-Israel strategic and military relationships, as well as the technological cooperation between them."

Netanyahu said the document marks the first time the United States pledges to enhance Israel's "deterrent" capabilities, but officials from both sides refused to detail what that could mean.

Officials say the document upgrades Israel's status as an ally of the United States, but they stress that this should not be construed as constituting a de facto military alliance.

Beyond calling for the upgrading of the strategic and military relationship, the document states: "The United States Government would view with particular gravity direct threats to Israel's security arising from the regional deployment of ballistic missiles of intermediate range or greater. In the event of such a threat, the United States government would consult promptly with the government of Israel with respect to what support, diplomatic and otherwise, or assistance, it can lend to Israel."

Jewish MDs targeted?

TORONTO — Is someone out there hunting Jewish doctors?

Early last week, Amherst N.Y. Dr. Barnett Slepian became the third Jewish physician who performs abortions to be shot by suspected anti-abortion zealots since 1994.

Slepian was murdered shortly after he and his family returned home from synagogue where they attended Shabbat services.

His shooting came about a year after Dr. Jack Fainman was wounded by a sniper in Winnipeg. In 1994, Dr. Garson Romalis was wounded in Vancouver while in 1995 a sniper wounded Dr. Hugh Short in Ancaster, just outside of Hamilton. Short is not believed to be Jewish.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Spy Agency Cleared

OTTAWA — Canada's spy agency has been cleared of any involvement in last fall's passport caper, in which Mossad agents used forged Canadian passports in a botched attempt to assassinate a Hamas leader in Jordan. In its annual report, the Security Intelligence Review Committee, which oversees the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), says there is no evidence CSIS played a role in Israel's bid to kill Khaled Meshal.

Jewish Teens Chosen

TORONTO — At least two Toronto Jewish teens will take part in Junior Summit '98, an international youth forum under the auspices of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT). Gil Hagi and Tsipora Mankovsky, both 16, will travel to MIT for six days in mid-November. They are among 100 youngsters selected from a group of 3,000 representing 139 countries, who discussed global issues, particularly technological ones, on an online forum. The in-person forum will have an audience of global media, Nobel laureates and world leaders.

Plans Made For New Shul

EDMONTON — A donation made by Bill Lutsky, in memory of his parents, Aaron and Gertrude Lutsky will allow Beth Israel Synagogue to move to a new building on land it currently owns in the city's west end. Plans for the new synagogue include a 500-seat theatre-style sanctuary, a social hall and two kitchens. Occupancy is expected late next year.

ISRAEL

Funeral For Jordanians

JERUSALEM — A funeral was held near Jerusalem last week for four Jordanian soldiers killed during the 1967 Six Day War. The bodies were uncovered three years ago during excavations at a site north of Jerusalem. A Jordanian delegation, including army officers and legislators, participated in the ceremony.

Israelis Back Accord

JERUSALEM — Some 74 percent of Israelis support the land-for-security agreement spelled out in the Wye River accord, according to a poll published by the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot. Eighteen percent of those polled oppose the pact, while eight percent have no opinion, according to the poll, which has a 4.5 percent margin of error.

Arms Exported

JERUSALEM — Israel is one of the world's leading arms exporters, according to the annual survey of the London-based Institute for Strategic Studies. Israeli arms sales exceeded $1.5 billion (US) last year and represented about 3.3 percent of the world arms market, the report noted.

Burial Policy May Change

JERUSALEM — The Israeli army may allow families of fallen soldiers to hold military funerals without the presence of a rabbi. The army chief of staff said the army is considering changing the regulations on military burials, which currently require a religious component.

Gingrich On Pollard

WASHINGTON — U.S. House Speaker Newt Gingrich says President Bill Clinton should not release Jonathan Pollard. Gingrich maintained that the jailed spy for Israel has knowledge of classified secrets, which he may sell to a foreign nation upon his release.

VILNIUS — Vandals overturned a monument to victims of the Holocaust in a cemetery near the village of Liaudiskes in northern Lithuania. Police are investigating.

Sex and the Married Jewish Couple

LONDON — Rabbi Shmuley Boteach has sold excerpts from his latest book, Kosher Sex, to Playboy magazine for a reported $200,000.

Rabbi Boteach, 32, whose fellow Chabadniks in Britain were critical of his first book, The Jewish Guide to Adultery, was asked to resign from an Orthodox synagogue in London following publication of Kosher Sex earlier this year. The rabbi counsels a liberal approach to sex between consenting, married adults. He anticipates a fresh outcry from Orthodox Jews over his deal with Playboy, which will publish the excerpts in its December issue.

While reiterating his opposition to pornography, he said he was delighted to use the pages of the magazine to communicate his "serious message" that married couples should strive to become more sexually intimate in order to stay together.

Rabbi Boteach, who has six children, insists that his approach to sex is deeply traditional and that he is motivated solely by a desire to strengthen marriage.

CJC urges WJC to boost Swiss fund payments

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The estimated 18,000 Holocaust survivors in Canada will not be adequately remunerated by the $2.5 million (US) offered them from the Swiss humanitarian fund, the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) national executive agreed at a recent meeting.

CJC president Moshe Ronen said he will urge the World Jewish Congress (WJC) to increase the amount for Canada.

The funds, part of the $188 million set aside for needy survivors, are separate from the $2.1-billion restitution settlement agreed to by Swiss banks.

If it was up to him, he would give money to any Holocaust survivor who claimed need, said Rabbi Gunther Plaut, chair of the Swiss restitution committee.

"It is obscene to ask any of these survivors to wait any longer," said Rabbi Plaut.

But survivor Herman Landau said he would not ask for any of the money and that CJC must define who is needy and eligible.

Ontario region chair Keith Landy said $2.5 million divided among 18,000 survivors would give them each $138 and would not help anybody in need. The survivors should give the money to Jewish education to ensure a Jewish future, he suggested. But several members said the survivors themselves should be polled about such an idea.

A better formula for compensating survivors needs to be worked out, said Tom Kuttner of Fredericton, N.B.

CJC offices and Rabbi Plaut are being inundated with requests for help, but so far the CJC has not received "one Swiss franc of the money," said CJC executive director Jack Silverstone.

In reply to complaints that CJC is lagging behind the United States in making application forms for help available, Ronen said the CJC was not in the picture until a month ago.

"We are being overwhelmed with requests and underwhelmed with information," Silverstone added.

No input was asked of the CJC by the WJC in allotting $2.5 million to Canada, Silverstone said.

Rabbi Plaut said the WJC worked out a formula under which there are an estimated 365,000 survivors in Israel, 200,000 in the former Soviet Union, 150,000 in the United States, and only 20,000 in "the rest of the world," including Canada and South America.

Rabbi Plaut said his committee will be made up mostly of survivors across Canada, "and not a nickel will be spent for administration."

He concluded: "Pray for me; we're facing a no-win situation. Nothing we do will be without the sharpest criticism."

On other fronts, the CJC executive decided to press the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) to deal with charges of anti-Semitism by its members.

"The leadership of the IRB doesn't seem interested in meeting with us or having a comprehensive inquiry into the complaints," Ronen said.

The executive heard that a conference in Ottawa Nov. 8 to 10, called Friends of Sabeel and co-sponsored by the Ottawa Anglican Diocese on the future of Jerusalem may "turn out to be an exercise in Israel bashing."

In addition, staffer Eric Vernon of the CJC Ottawa office said the speakers listed have an anti-Israel bias and include a well-known Jewish anti-Zionist.

The genesis of the first Friends of Sabeel conference in North America is innocent enough, Vernon said, but the CJC has asked him to meet with its president, Naim Ateek, on Nov. 11.

Ronen reported that a good partnership has been worked out with the United Israel Appeal (UIA), particularly with the federations in Toronto and Montreal. This has resulted in the CJC setting up a stronger advocacy office in Ottawa.

The national CJC administration will remain in Montreal, but its executive director will have an office in both Ottawa and Montreal, while the Quebec region will leave CJC headquarters in the Samuel Bronfman building and move rent-free into the new Federation campus.

These changes reported by Milton Harris, former president, will cost $300,000. Federations have agreed to pay half the cost.

"Our funding partners now have a better appreciation of what the CJC does," he said.

An attempt is being made to sell the Samuel Bronfman building in Montreal and any income will go to an endowment to fund CJC programs, he said.

A new internal governance plan for CJC drafted by committee head Zena Simces of Vancouver was adopted.

When memory beckons

Too often in modern times, we have attempted to build for our youth a structure of Jewish identity that has rested on two-pillars only: the Holocaust and Israel.

But feelings of Jewish peoplehood should not be triggered only by recalling the horrors of the Holocaust or by expressing pride in the achievements of Israel.

Jewish identity should be based on the positive, intrinsic richness and myriad meaningful, spiritual possibilities within Judaism itself.

Rather than stepping meekly forward, if at all, to experience "peoplehood" on the sheltered peripheries of our lives, we should try to "dance" with a feeling of community, belonging and peoplehood at the very centre of our lives.

Mourning must be seen in the context of celebration. The laws must be seen in the context of responsibilities. The Sabbath must be seen in the context of holiness. History must be seen in the context of purpose.

Across five millennia, in our homes, in our schools and in our synagogues, one generation has transmitted to the next an awareness of our history.

Memory – collective and individual – has been the key instrument defining that transmission.

This of course, brings us back to the Holocaust and to Israel. They were and are the two most radical physical/metaphysical interventions into Jewish history this century.

Thus, while Jewish identity must not be triggered solely by evocations of the Holocaust and Israel, Jewish identity that is bereft of a personal commitment to "remembering" the Holocaust and to "supporting" the State of Israel runs the risk of soon slipping into a self-centered, exclusivist obsession with ritual observance alone.

It is against this background therefore, that I beckon memory, and recall for readers two special dates this week that have seared a mark on the pages of Jewish history.

Three years ago yesterday, November 4, Yitzhak Rabin was murdered by Yigal Amir.

Political anger and religious sanctimony combined into a ghastly, horrible evil that casually, without even the smallest regret, took life in the false name of saving life.

In Amir's mind, murder was an acceptable method of political expression, religion the justification.

The shame and the sorrow of Amir's cowardly act fell on all of us because he was one of us.

We hope and we pray that there is no residue of political/religious extremist poison dripping into the body politic of the state.

We hope and we pray that Israel has not been forever altered, forever infected by that poison. But we see an alarming edge of intolerance and disrespect among the extremists. Brandishing the Bible, they delegitimize those with whom they do not agree. And, thus delegitimized, their co-religionist fellow countrymen's views hardly matter.

Even as these words are being written, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu lives in the shadow of threats by Jewish extremists against his life.

Were it not so frightening it would be unbelievable.

Three years later, Rabin's murder shakes us.

Sixty years ago, on the night of November 9 and into the day of November 10, the Jews of Germany finally, without illusion or delusion, came face to face with the wild beast of Nazi terror.

Over the course of 24 hours of savage street violence, 91 Jews were killed. More than 30,000 were arrested and sent to concentration camps.

But as Martin Gilbert describes in his book The Holocaust, "[I]t was not by the killing however, nor by the arrests or by the suicides, that the night of November 9 was to be remembered. During the night, as well as breaking into tens of thousands of shops and homes, the stormtroopers set fire to 191 synagogues; or, if it was thought that fire might endanger nearby buildings, smashed the synagogues as thoroughly as possible with hammers and axes.

"The destruction of the synagogues led the Nazis to call that night the Kristallnacht, or 'night of broken glass': words chosen deliberately to mock and belittle…

"In the aftermath of the Kristallnacht, German Jewry was "fined" for the damage done. The fine, a thousand million marks, was levied by the compulsory confiscation of 20 percent of the property of every German Jew. This confiscation was promulgated by government decree on November 12, 1938. Three days later, following more than five years of being pilloried and discriminated against in the classroom, German Jewish children were finally barred from German schools."

And, while memory beckons, let us also remember 19-year-old Alexei Neykov. He came to Israel from Russia as a teenager.

Last week, he prevented more than 40 schoolchildren from being blown to bits by a craven, sadistic Hamas suicide bomber. He placed his jeep between a bomb-laden truck and a school bus, and steered the truck away from the children on the bus.

He undoubtedly understood in that split second, valorous decision that he was offering his life for the safety of the children.

From this day forward, anyone who complains about Russian aliyah, should remember Alexei Neykov.

Spousal abuse often a hidden problem, says rabbi

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

Rabbi Abraham Twerski

TORONTO — It is almost impossible to determine how prevalent spousal abuse is in the Jewish community because Jewish families are experts at concealing their problems, says Rabbi Abraham Twerski, a psychiatrist and author.

"If the federal government could do that, there would be no leaks," said Rabbi Twerski, author of The Shame Borne in Silence: Spouse Abuse in the Jewish Community. (Mirkov Publications, Inc.)

Rabbi Twerski, who will speak at the Jewish Book Fair on Nov. 10, at a lecture sponsored by Jewish Women's Federation and Jewish Family & Child Service, is founder and medical director of Gateway Rehabilitation Centre in western Pennsylvania. He said in a recent interview from New York that, "suffice it to say, the incidence of [abuse] is greater than what we may think, and if it is true that it is less than in the non-Jewish population, that is a hollow consolation.

"It is still far too great an incidence, and it is the responsibility of the community to do whatever it can to remedy it and provide resources for help."

Organized public lectures about spouse abuse may bring the problem into the open, he said, and may stimulate a community to take steps to provide for the needs of the abused wife. "However, let us not lose sight of the fact that an abused wife does not get any relief from public lectures. The abused wife needs help, real help. Every Jewish community should have a 24-hour hotline, operated by trained personnel."

As well, said Rabbi Twerski, there should be immediate access to legal counsel provided by the community, proper shelter accommodations provided for the wife and children, and emergency funds for temporary support until something can be worked out.

Education is essential, he said, in the fight against spouse abuse. "All young men and women should be prepared for what it means to be married and what it means to be parents. If we wait until after [an incident occurs], we have lost an opportunity. The incident could have been averted, if the couple had understood the red flags."

Some of the behavioral clues Rabbi Twerski labels as red flags include a person who has behaved violently toward others, a person who loses his temper more frequently and more easily than others and a person who breaks things when angry.

As well, a woman should be aware if her husband tries to isolate her from her family and friends, and if he expects her to spend all her free time with him exclusively. "Any indication of control should be a red flag. Women should trust their instincts. People should not be controlled by other people."

Often, there are no behavioral clues to identify an abuser, and in this case, "the next best thing is early case identification. In the overwhelming number of wife abuse cases, the woman has been tolerating abuse for years by the time she finally seeks help from anyone. This is wrong, dead wrong. Abuse must be nipped in the bud. Steps must be taken not to allow the abuse to continue."

Rabbi Twerski stressed that it is not his intent to break up marriages. "To the contrary, ignoring and denying spouse abuse is what will ultimately result, not only in the dissolution of marriages, but also in an impact on the children.

"If spouse abuse is identified and properly managed early, there is hope for the survival of the marriage. However, the survival of the marriage is contingent on the abuser's choosing to make changes in himself."

Ackerman wins Yiddish prize

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —An immigrant's impassioned plea for a better life in America is the message of Der Kol, which won first prize in a Yiddish song writing competition.

The song's lyrics were written by Eileen Ackerman, recalling the memories her mother Tilli had of her birthplace in Tulcea on the Black Sea in Rumania.

Tilli Goldenberg arrived in Toronto in 1904, and the family, part of a Montefiore sponsored immigration plan, settled in the Queen-Ossington area.

"My mother said life was bitter in Romania but they heard of better things happening in America, and her heart cried out for this better life," said Ackerman.

The words of Der Kol were set to music by Ackerman's daughter, Eleanor Ackerman-Rice, and Eleanor's brother-in-law, Dr. David Saslove.

Der Kol won first-prize at the International Yiddish Institute song writing competition in Charlotte, N.C.

"I do not speak Yiddish, my mother is not a musician, and my brother-in-law studied German in university, but we turned out to be a winning combination," said Ackerman-Rice.

Ackerman-Rice is the musical director at Temple Har Zion in Thornhill, and also directs the seniors' choir for the Bernard Betel Centre.

New wave of terrorism seen as threat in wake of accord

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The most immediate danger facing Israel's Oct. 23 peace-for-security agreement with the Palestine Authority (PA) is a new wave of Islamic fundamentalist terrorism, says an Israeli analyst.

"Hamas wants to wreck the peace process," said Barry Rubin, a senior resident scholar at the Begin-Sadat Centre for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University in Tel Aviv.

"The agreement is directed against Hamas more so than the 1993 Declaration of Principles and the 1995 Oslo 2 accord. Hamas and Islamic Jihad will make a serious effort at terrorism."

Successful terrorist attacks will "put a damper" on the pact, conceded Rubin, editor of Middle East Review of International Affairs. "But the peace process will not collapse. Both sides need it."

In an interview, Rubin, the author of several books about the region, said that Israel's prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, is seriously interested in implementing the Wye Memorandum, as last month's agreement is known.

"Netanyahu is not an ideologue, and he's more flexible than imagined. He wants to keep the process alive, and move it forward."

Netanyahu is prepared to offer the Palestinians autonomy, provided no Jewish settlements in the disputed territories are dismantled, said Rubin.

At best, he will relinquish no more than 70 percent of the West Bank as part of a final settlement, an offer he doubts the Palestinians will accept.

The PA, he observed, wants a Palestinian state, with East Jerusalem as its capital.

In Rubin's judgment, the Wye Memorandum represents a step toward Palestinian statehood. But he voiced skepticism that final status talks, which have yet to begin, would be concluded on schedule on May 4, 1999.

It's quite probable that the PA will unilaterally declare a Palestinian state next May, but it will not make much of a difference to the peace process, he argued.

According to Rubin, Netanyahu will survive politically despite disaffection among his far-right backers.

"Even though he has lost some of his support, he's in a good position. He's firmly in the saddle." His critics, notably the National Religious Party, have nowhere else to go. "What is their alternative?"

At present, the chances of a national unity government are nil, he noted. The Labor party, led by Ehud Barak, will not back Netanyahu's policies. Besides, a national unity regime would be a prescription for political paralysis, he observed.

Despite the presence of extremists like Hamas among the Palestinians, the overall trend in Palestinian politics is one toward moderation. On the other hand, he cautioned, Palestinian public opinion is changeable.

Rubin believes that Syria is not interested in signing a peace treaty with Israel because it would threaten its control of Lebanon and expose the Syrian regime to severe internal strains.

In theory, he said, Syria poses more of a military threat to Israel than Iran.

In Rubin's view, Egypt generally plays a positive role in Middle East peacemaking, but Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak fears Israeli domination of the region.

Saudi Arabia, he said, has been "totally unhelpful" in furthering the peace process.

If United Nations economic sanctions are lifted, Iraq will rebuild its armed forces, said Rubin. In the meantime, the United States has shelved its determination to destroy all of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction.

Rubin was in Toronto under the auspices of the Canada-Israel Committee and Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University.

Former Toronto mayor praised at memorial lecture

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Phil Givens was a conscious, deliberate Jew and a blessing for the general community," Rabbi Erwin Schild said at a memorial marking the third anniversary of the former mayor's death.

Phil Givens

Givens' role in organizing a UJA mission to Israel following the Yom Kippur war 25 years ago was recalled by the evening's chair, David Newman.

"He proudly led the mission across the Suez Canal on a bridge built by Ariel Sharon during the war," Newman said.

Among the audience at the memorial sponsored by the Yiddish Culture Council at the Workmen's Circle Hall was the former mayor's wife, Min Givens.

"Phil spoke with wisdom, and he was a real orator in English and Yiddish," said Rabbi Schild, rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel Synagogue.

Recalling his friendship with the former mayor, Rabbi Schild said he remembers Givens speaking at Adath Israel when he was an up-and-coming alderman for the ward, and later, before the Yom Kippur war, to a group of "entranced" young people.

"Though his real name was Pinchas Givertz, Phil Givens was not a split personality. He was together as one man, a passionate Zionist, a wonderful family man and the best mayor Toronto ever had," Rabbi Schild said.

Another feature of the evening was a talk on Morris Rosenfeld, poet of the ghetto, by Mark Miller, of Columbia University, a former Montrealer. His talk marked the 75th anniversary of the poet's death.

Eli Moidel read excerpts from Rosenfeld's poetry.

UJA Federation training leaders for the future

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

(Part 1 of a two-part story)

TORONTO — There's an old maxim that states, "leaders are born, not made."

That may have been true once, but not any more. At UJA Federation, human resources experts have taken that aphorism and turned it on its head.

They believe that with the proper education and motivation, leaders can indeed be made.

For 35 years, the Toronto Jewish federation has operated a leadership development program designed to give community volunteers the skills they need to contribute to policy-making at numerous community agencies.

Recently, the federation has added a "young leadership" program to recruit and train future policy-makers at an early age.

The flagship of the federation's efforts is its Leadership Development Program (LDP), an intensive 1½-year period of study, discussion and hands-on participation. Held every two years, the program is designed to graduate volunteers who will join community organizations in policy-making roles on committees and, ultimately, boards of directors.

"The foundation of many of these organizations are the lay people setting the policy and making the decisions," said Chaia Nadal, a federation senior associate who coordinates the LDP. "They're the backbone of these agencies."

Nadal noted that the federation's leadership programs are geared mainly toward policy-making, as opposed to providing direct service volunteers. "Some of the most significant leaders in the community are graduates of the program," she said.

Its effectiveness has been recognized by the Council of Jewish Federations, a North American body which in 1989 bestowed its leadership development award on the program.

Deborah Pinsky, director of the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC), estimates that 20 percent of the BJC's board of directors are LDP graduates. "I get a lot of very valuable board members through their programs," she said.

Reena, the agency that serves developmentally challenged individuals, has had an open line of communication to the LDP for some years, said Sandy Keshen, the organization's executive-director.

An estimated 15 percent of the agency's board has been referred by the federation. But as with the BJC, these volunteers usually begin their association with Reena by serving on committees before taking more senior positions, she said.

At Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), a UJA beneficiary, the numbers are somewhat smaller. Gordon Wolfe, the agency's longtime director, while lavish in his praise for the program, estimates that fewer than 10 percent of JF&CS's volunteers come through the federation connection.

"I think the program has value. It attracts people to the community's family of agencies. But the fact of the matter is that we get a lot of people who want to volunteer by word of mouth," Wolfe said.

Zac Kaye, director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, also a beneficiary agency of UJA, has a similar take on the federation's assistance. He said the LDP program has been only "somewhat helpful" to the student organization.

When Campus Services was first established, the federation provided people to help get the organization on its feet, he said. Its president, a past president and two members of the organization's executive came from the LDP list.

But since then, the federation and the agency have been unable to recruit enough people who are passionate about the work. "There are not enough people to go around," Kaye maintained.

For UJA Federation, recruiting new community leaders and preparing them for key roles is a year-round undertaking. Five staffers are dedicated to the task.

The process begins each spring when the federation sends out mailings to its affiliated agencies, synagogues, schools and other organizations. At the same time, the federation is receptive to applicants who come out of the blue to volunteer their services, Nadal said.

Generally, 100 applications are considered seriously and selectors whittle that number down to 50. They consider factors such as a balance between men and women, religious backgrounds and organizational affiliation. Historically, more women than men have been involved, Nadal said.

Generally, most volunteers who come have been professionals — doctors, lawyers, teachers, accountants. Most have some Jewish education, she added.

Once chosen, participants meet regularly for group lectures, breaking into smaller groups for discussion and to complete assigned projects. They learn about public speaking, negotiation techniques, running committees and other boardroom skills. An important component of the program is education in Jewish history and Jewish organizational life in Toronto.

At the end of the program, this year on Nov. 9, graduates and community agencies will meet at an Agency Fair to trade ideas and find suitable volunteer matches.

In addition to that meeting, the federation provides a referral service. But it's up to the volunteers to agree to a referral, often based on what they've learned in the LDP, Nadal said.

The time has long passed when large, complex organizations could simply rely on the amateur expertise of their supporters and relatives to make them run, said Gerald Fisher, director of human resources at UJA Federation.

"We feel it's really important that given the complexity of issues facing our agencies, schools and synagogues, it requires a certain basic level of expertise and some minimal requisite skills," Fisher said.

"We're trying to set a direction, a process for developing good governance in all our agencies and our role is to augment the volunteer recruitment of people with commitment."

Unlike the U.S. experience, where leadership development often goes hand in hand with fundraising ability and expectations of philanthropic giving, in Toronto the focus is on developing personnel to assume leadership in policy-making roles, Fisher said.

Next week, we'll look at the federation's efforts to attract younger people.

At the core, falsehood

It took Quebec Premier Lucien Bouchard only three days to violate the promise he made at the outset of the election campaign that he would not "engage in personal attacks" against Liberal leader Jean Charest. Speaking Saturday night to a gathering in Sherbrooke, Charest's home riding, the premier ridiculed Charest as "a man in denial of Quebec. Jean Charest does not like Quebec the way it is with its profound identity."

The invective against Charest followed by one day a similarly stiletto verbal lashing against the federal government. In emotion-soaked hyperbole that, regrettably, is the premier's trademark, Bouchard did his best to whip the audience into a nationalistic frenzy: "When are we going to stop sending half our taxes to Ottawa to have them managed by those who have different interests than ours, who thwart our decisions... who invade our jurisdictions, divide us, weaken us, debilitate us?"

And so it has begun.

The people of Quebec will elect a new provincial government on Nov. 30. Judging by the premier's pre-campaign rhetoric, which noted commentator Lysiane Gagnon described as "punchy, vicious and extremely demagogic," and by his early campaign fusillades, the contest for votes will resemble a street fight: no holds barred, no punches too low.

The choices in the contest are clear. Bouchard is promising to create "winning conditions" for taking Quebec out of Canada. Charest, on the other hand, is promising to create winning conditions, as it were, for keeping Quebec inside Canada.

Both leaders are targeting the undecided, primarily francophone voters, the "soft federalists" as they are called. Charest offers them economic and social policy alternatives. Bouchard, on the other hand, offers them the traditional scapegoat for their fears and the tired target for their hostilities: Ottawa, whom he accuses of refusing to revise and reinvigorate the current federalist structure.

But it is a sham offering by the premier, an argument without substantive merit, and, more to the point, at its core, a falsehood.

Time and time again, Premier Bouchard has promised his party that he is not interested in renewing the Canadian federation. He is only interested in removing Quebec from it. He is, therefore, attempting to persuade the undecided, "soft" voters on the basis of a possibility that he suggests to them he would embrace, but which in fact, he assures his party loyalists, he abhors.

A regrettable decision

The decision last week by Great Britain's High Court of Justice to quash the arrest warrants issued against former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet was regrettable. Pinochet had been arrested while in Britain at the request of a special Spanish prosecutor seeking his extradition on charges of murder, kidnapping and torture.

"The applicant is entitled to immunity as a former sovereign from criminal and civil process in the English courts... A former head of state is clearly entitled to immunity for criminal acts committed in the course of exercising public functions."

Legal and human rights experts around the world lament the decision. They correctly point out that the decision may undermine the international effort to outlaw and punish the perpetrators of crimes against humanity. How can conscience acquiesce to the notion that committing atrocities or ordering genocide are protected activities of a head of state because they fall within "the exercise of public functions?"

Let's hope the appeal succeeds.

Clinton should forgive Pollard as well

President Bill Clinton has begged for forgiveness and has indicated that his fate is now in the hands of God. Jonathan Pollard has asked for forgiveness and has served much more time than any person previously convicted of providing state secrets to an ally. His fate is in the hands of Clinton, and it would indeed be timely if Clinton showed the same compassion to Pollard that he is asking for himself.

Dreyfus affair mapped route to Holocaust

Linda Goldman asks who was Madelaine Levy? Madelaine Levy, who was rounded up with French Jews and shipped to Auschwitz where she perished, was the granddaughter of Alfred Dreyfus. Surviving family members found it appropriate to inscribe her name on Alfred Dreyfus' tombstone.

Might one conclude that the anti-Semitism in France that spun the Dreyfus affair in 1894 was a precursor to the Holocaust? I believe it was.

Academic freedom not issue on circumcision

Morton Weinfeld's letter and article (CJN, Oct. 15) are to say the least contradictory. What I find contradictory is his spirited defence of Dr. Margaret Somerville's position on circumcision and his holier than thou attitude towards the politically motivated shenanigans going on in the United States.

Somerville seems to shoot from the lip on every occasion when a little reflection and research would do well to temper these outbursts. It becomes tiresome to hear some academics constantly tout the canard about academic freedom when anyone questions their opinions, even when they disregard some of the basic facts.

Kanader Adler helped Yiddish in Montreal

Re: David Lazarus' article about the Kanader Adler (CJN, Oct. 22).

Lazarus is to be commended for his positive assessment of the establishment by the late Hersh Wolofsky of Montreal's Yiddish daily newspaper Kanader Adler. Sustained by his sons Max and Daniel for a number of years, it remained a quality mouthpiece of our Yiddish speaking community for a considerable number of years.

When Max found it impossible to carry on following the decline of our Yiddish readership, the National Committee for Yiddish, then of the Canadian Jewish Congress, stepped in and undertook to revive the Kanader Adler as a weekly.

As much as the committee deserves recognition for undertaking a difficult task, in view of the dwindling Yiddish readership in our community, the lion's share of the praise belongs to Sara Rosenfeld, the talented, dedicated director of the committee.

There can be no doubt of the lasting imprint left by the Kanader Adler on the now relatively somewhat better fortune of Yiddish in Montreal.

Differs with reviews of The Gifts of the Jews

This is in reference to reviews in The CJN (various dates) of The Gifts of the Jews by Thomas Cahill.

To spare other unsuspecting people the unpleasantness and distaste that I experienced while reading this book, I want to warn your readers that it is not as it appears to be. It actually spends very little time writing about what special gifts the Jews gave the world, but rather purports to be a history of the Jews.

It takes Cahill more than 50 pages to even get to Abraham, the patriarch of the Jewish people, as he prattles on and on about previous civilizations and cultures and their licentious religious and sacrificial rites. When he finally does get to the founders of the Jewish religion (both male and female), he often speaks of them in a disparaging or belittling manner, sometimes even ascribing to them impure motives, thus showing a total lack of understanding on his part of their true characters.

This book is filled with distortions and inaccuracies and mistranslations of the Bible, and very often the language used is either crude or lewd, unbefitting a book that by the author's own admission is about a holy nation. One very annoying habit of the author is to refer to the God of the Jews using the four-letter Hebrew name. Not one Jew that I know of ever refers to God in this way, except in prayer.

The real lesson of the Akedah

By JERRY FRIEDMAN

The Akedah intrigues us at every stage of our lives. As children, we learn in helpless fascination the story of a father who is ready to kill his child and is prevented from doing so only at the last minute. As young adults, we are inspired by Abraham's unquestioning and fervent obedience; Abraham, described by Sören Kierkegaard as a "knight of faith," is our emblem of absolute belief. Later in life, as parents, we may seek a psychological understanding of Abraham's actions. We wonder what kind of unconscious drives or wishes, feelings of rivalry or disappointment, underlie Abraham's readiness to do away with his son.

Throughout Jewish history, the story of the binding of Isaac has become a paradigm of faith, associated with martyrdom in both ancient and contemporary times. From the sacrifices of Hannah and her children in the times of the Maccabees, to the slaughter of innocents in the Holocaust, the binding of Isaac illuminates the generations of martyrdom Al Kiddush HaShem, sacrifices in which there was no intervening angel.

Sacrifice of Isaac by Rembrandt
[From The Law and the Prophets, Abrams]

Seen from a different perspective, however, the Akedah yields a radically different paradigm. Abraham's single-minded willingness to answer the call to sacrifice his only son, and the fact that he needs to be stopped by an angel of God, may function as a caveat – less a test of faith than a lesson demonstrating the perils of unrestrained religious zeal.

Many readers have wondered at Abraham's almost indecent readiness to perform this ultimate sacrifice. Is this the same Abraham who vehemently argued with God at Sodom, negotiating for the lives of a city of strangers: "Will the Judge of all the land not act justly?" The contrast between this individual and the father who is so ready to obey the command that he sacrifice his beloved son raises a question: Would the Abraham of Sodom, who confronts God on an issue of humane justice, have silently accepted this command as a simple test of faith? The inconsistency leads one to conclude that perhaps Abraham's willingness to carry out this command comes from a source other than faithful obedience.

The text is careful to emphasize the intimate relationship between the father and son prior to the sacrificial act. Isaac is referred to as bincha asher ahavta (your son whom you love). The togetherness of Abraham and Isaac as they ascend the mountain is continually stressed (shneihem yachdav). Isaac is described only in terms that tie him to Abraham, so that the son is seen more as an extension of the father than as an individual in his own right. Isaac is to become for Abraham the tool through which Abraham will demonstrate his devotion to God.

As a result of the ordeal on Mount Moriah, Abraham's closest relationships undergo a noticeable change. There is no further specific mention of Isaac returning from the mountain with his father. The language expressing togetherness, ease and intimacy is absent. The family unit is shattered as well. We learn that Sarah dies shortly after the Akedah. The rabbis tell us that her death occurred as a result of her belief that her son was sacrificed.

Moreover, Abraham's relationship with God undergoes a change. The faithful servant who apparently has passed the most demanding test of faith is never again addressed directly by God. We may wonder whether Abraham did, in fact, pass the test. More significantly, we may wonder exactly what the test was.

Many rabbinic commentators have questioned whether, indeed, the Akedah is to be read as a test of faith. Instead they have interpreted it as a lesson. On the simplest level, the Akedah takes a position against child sacrifice, which was widely practised in neighboring pagan societies. Although the readiness to sacrifice one's children may be seen as the ultimate test of faith, in fact the God of Abraham does not ultimately require it and sends an angel to intervene and forbid Abraham to carry out the act.

By the time the angel appears, however, Abraham is so deeply committed to the act that the angel must tell him not once, but twice, to desist: "Do not put a hand on the boy and do not do anything to him." Given Abraham's unquestioning obedience to the earlier command and his single-mindedness in carrying it out, the reader is left with the impression that, instead of giving Abraham a welcome way out, the angel actually has to restrain him. If there is any test at this point it is: Will Abraham stop? It is only when Abraham lays down the knife that the angel can declare, "Now I know you are a God-fearing man."

In instructing Abraham to sacrifice his son, God unleashes a torrent of religious zeal. Abraham is a changed man in responding to this command. He feels privileged to undertake the supreme sacrifice to demonstrate his faith. This explains the puzzling absence of any hesitation or questioning on that inexorable march to Mount Moriah. Abraham has lost touch with two aspects of this authentic self: his willingness to engage and dispute with God, and his ability to recognize the integrity of another human being, in this case, his son. The command to sacrifice his son elicits no equivocation from Abraham. Instead, Isaac, the long-awaited son of his old age, the future of a great people, becomes an extension of Abraham in his religious zeal, a means by which Abraham can demonstrate his faith.

In stopping the sacrifice, the angel must remind Abraham that Isaac is an individual apart from himself, not an extension of his religious ardor. A life is at stake here, the life of the na'ar (the boy or lad). Abraham must recognize that there are limits to what he regards as an act of faith. He must stop before he kills. In stopping, Abraham shows that there are limits to religious zeal. Herein lies the real test and lesson of the Akedah.The truly god-fearing person must reconcile this essential paradox – the tension between the passion to serve God and the God-given human responsibility we have for one another.

Generations later, Mount Moriah, the site of the Akedah, becomes the site of the Beit Hamikdash. The sacrificial rituals enacted here in Temple times extend the lesson of the Akedah by providing a carefully structured and controlled avenue for the expression of faith. The detailed laws of Temple sacrifice, by prescribing a rigid formula for worship, function in part as an institutional response to the dangers of unrestrained religious fervor.

The Akedah presents a complex picture of faith. It asks us to examine how to ardently express our faith, and warns us of the danger of blinding religious passion. We have seen the tragic results when, in our own time, religious zeal has led to dehumanizing and even murderous words and acts. The Akedah tells us to be wary of the clash between what we interpret as our religious duty, the compelling "call" of faith, and our accountability to others and to our authentic selves. Abraham, on fire with religious passion, was brought face-to-face with this conflict on Mount Moriah.

Making friends in Halifax

Smoke wafts to the ceiling to be sucked in by the air purifiers. The cue ball is knocked into the corner pocket and empty glasses litter the tables. A typical night at The Wardroom, the King's campus bar. Voices try to compete with the blaring music, which suddenly changes from rap to retro, and the voices lose. Just a typical Saturday night, except for one thing. Why are there kosher snacks on all the tables?

Jennifer Fox in Halifax

The annual Schmooze and Booze, the first event for the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students Federation (APJSF) takes place at the end of each September, after the stress of starting another school year has subsided. The APJSF is an organization that tries to get Jewish university students to meet and hang out with other Jewish university students. Simply for meeting fellow Jews, the APJSF is needed more than its counterparts in Toronto or Montreal. Accidentally bumping into other Jews on campus is less likely in the Maritimes.

The Wardroom is beginning to fill. The small clusters around the tables have transformed into large, loud groups of people. Having been here for two hours already, I've had enough time to finish one bowl of pretzels and to use up my reserve of small talk. I've already quizzed my neighbors on their school, program, living arrangements and hometown. A few statements about Judaism and Israel have been uttered, but not enough to allow a passerby to guess what all these people have in common.

They don't have much in common really, except for being Jewish. Given this realization, another question springs to mind. Why bother? Why come to a bar when I don't drink only to leave smelling like an ashtray when I don't smoke? Probably for the same reason I attended all those United Synagogue Youth dances in high school when I don't dance – to mingle, to network, to meet Jews.

I already know lots of Jews. It's hard to live in Thornhill, Ont., for 14 years and not make a Jewish friend here or there. In Halifax I can't make the same claim, but I know I interact with my Jewish friends the same way I interact with my non-Jewish friends.

So why go talk to strangers for three hours when I can be at home with people I already know? Because my King's friends don't quite understand why I get so worked up over the Middle East Peace Talks, and though they were curious, they didn't have to fast for 26 hours for Yom Kippur. Knowing Jews, no matter where you live, gives you a sense of familiarity and comfort.

The APJSF has its own agenda for throwing this yearly gathering. The Schmooze and Booze is the on-sale item that gets shoppers into the store. While they're looking for their two-for-one sale, something else will spark their interest and they'll buy a big-ticket item. A social event gets students to put their name on a mailing list, and hopefully 20 or 40 of the 75 students who came to The Wardroom will make another appearance at a Shabbat dinner or a bagel brunch with a speaker. Good marketing in September builds the membership base for a successful year.

Midnight approaches and it's time to leave. I grab my jacket and head for the door. I've had my fill of new faces, brief biographies and listening to the fly-hitting-a-bug-zapper sound the air purifiers make in a futile attempt to cleanse the air of smoke. I didn't make any new friends tonight, but that wasn't the point. At the next APJSF event, hopefully I'll recognize some faces. Now I know there are Jews in the area, now I know I'm not alone.

History in the making

What year was the War of 1812 fought? What color was Napoleon's white horse?

Historical facts and events can guide us in our present lives and motivate our actions. However, I vividly remember Grade 10 Canadian history and my relentless efforts to memorize names and dates, all of which I would forget two minutes after having handed in my exam. This was not the result of apathy, but rather, these abstract facts bore no relevance to my life. I was interested to learn about the battle on the Plains of Abraham, about Generals Montcalm and Wolfe (I apologize die-hard Chinese food fans, no General Tao here), but at the end of the day, it was a mere mumbo-jumbo of data.

Upon visiting Upper Canada Village at the end of Grade 6, I enjoyed the re-enactment in the old schoolhouse and the woman who dressed up in a bonnet and apron like a strict school teacher and continuously whipped the desk where I sat during her little show. The history we had learned about so briefly came to life during our three-hour visit there.

It is like matching a name to a face. In this day and age, when electronics and advanced technology have replaced human contact, it is nice for you to finally be able to present yourself to your professor and say, "Now you can match my face to my millions of typos you read over e-mail."

My intent is not to bash the cocooning that has developed in the past two decades, but rather to highlight our more readily available access to the world at large and to first-hand experiences. How lucky we are that today, when a breaking news story is unfolding, we can watch on TV and make judgments of our own. (Granted, of course, that actually being there is even better, but that is a luxury less frequently extended to most of us). Clearly, my visit to Upper Canada Village was not a true first-hand experience, because it was a re-creation, but it was evidently the closest I could come to the "real thing."

Q: Why was the UN worried when the waiter dropped a platter of turkey on the floor?
A: It meant the fall of Turkey, the ruin of Greece and the break-up of China.

After school on Friday, Oct. 23, I tuned in to CNN to watch the signing of the Middle East agreement. I sat transfixed and listened attentively to the words being spoken.

In the past, when students were asked about specific historical events, perhaps their closest relation to and recognition of them was in jokes. They remained words typed in a book, with a picture or two. The story could have been completely fictitious, as far as they were concerned, because they could not fathom the reality. Today, with the multitude of technological developments, we are able to view visual images which could make us feel as though we are actually in Confucius' sixth century B.C. or Shakespeare's 16th.

Q: Why is Saturday night important to Julius' girlfriend?
A: That's when Julius Caesar (sees her).

Truth be told, it is not the same. No visual imagery could ever reproduce a society of centuries ago and do it justice. One problem is that we would be bringing to the experience 20th century attitudes and values, which have been manipulated and created to deal with problems that have evolved since then.

Anyway, I was trying, on that Friday afternoon to relish the moment. I was able to sit in the comfort of my own home and watch, as leaders, who just nine days earlier had been in steadfast disagreement, now signed documents and shook hands.

Their calling each other "co-partners in peace," although we may not realize it now, will be included in the history textbooks from which our grandchildren will study. And, while to them the words will remain words and nothing more, to us, to people who had the opportunity to appreciate the context and background from which these words were expressed, we will always remember the Wye Plantation summit of October 1998.

Q: What one difference between Arafat and Netanyahu did Clinton comment on, on Oct. 23, 1998?
A: Benjamin, I could never picture you in a kaffiyeh.

It's exciting. We witnessed history in the making.

Holocaust started 60 years ago

At the end of October 1938, a young Polish Jew living in Paris, Herschel Grynszpan, received a letter from his parents in Germany:

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

"We are now stateless. The Poles have taken away our citizenship papers and the Germans want to take away our residents' permit. We may have to leave, but as stateless persons, where could we go?"

A few days later, Le Monde, the well-known Paris daily, brought further news. On Oct. 28, the Gestapo had rounded up thousands of Polish Jews and dumped them at the Polish border. There, the paper reported, they existed in utter deprivation, suspended between two nations that had one objective: to prohibit these Jews from entering or re-entering their countries.

Grynszpan had no further word from his parents. Every day, he scanned the press for news. What there was, read like the reportage of a soccer match, minus the pinch of emotion one might find even on the sports page. No one seemed to care. What would it take to let people understand that Jews were human beings, not animals shipped in box cars to the stock yards?

In despair, Grynszpan wandered the streets of Paris. When he passed a gun shop he made a sudden decision, and bought a revolver. He took the Metro to the German Embassy. When the door was opened, he asked to speak to the ambassador. He trembled, he could hardly speak.

The ambassador asked his third secretary to enquire after the visitor's wishes. Moments later, Ernst von Rath lay mortally wounded. Grynszpan had mistaken him for the ambassador.

The shooting was news around the world, for young Grynszpan told the reasons for his desperate act to the police, and did so with dramatic urgency. The press was sympathetic.

What Grynszpan did not know was that he had given the Nazis the ammunition that they had been looking for. They decided to use the incident as a frontal assault on Germany's Jews. Sixty years ago, on the night of Nov. 9/10, they burned or destroyed 1,100 places of Jewish worship. Twenty thousand Jews were arrested, 36 were killed and another 36 seriously wounded. A decree from the government ordered German Jewry to clean up all debris across the country occasioned by the burning, and to pay damages to the government.

That night, my wife and I happened to attend a special celebration in Cincinnati, Ohio. The telephone rang, and we were informed that terrible events had taken place in Germany.

Later on, I found out that my own Dad was in hiding while we partied in Cincinnati. He and Mother eventually made it to England, but all too many had no place to go, and ended up in the gas chambers.

On that November night in 1938, the 600,000 Jews of Germany had lost their last legal protection, and had become fair prey to the Nazis' rapacious appetite. The ultimate pogrom – now known as the Holocaust – had begun. It was not to stop until the Nazis were vanquished, but by then, six million Jews had perished.

The Kirshner File

Remembering Yitzhak Rabin

Carmi Gillon, the director of Israel's internal security agency, Shin Bet, warned Yitzhak Rabin repeatedly that Jewish extremists were threatening violence against him. But Rabin, a hardened warrior, shrugged off the warning, refusing even to wear a bullet-proof vest. "A Jew would not kill another Jew," Rabin said blithely, ignoring the looming danger.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In the three years since Rabin's assassination at the hands of Yigal Amir, a Jewish fanatic, Israeli prime ministers have come to know better than to scoff at such warnings. Nevertheless, it is sobering and saddening that such a cold-blooded crime could have been committed.

Since Rabin's untimely death, journalists have churned out numerous profiles, while memoirists, notably his wife and his granddaughter, have commemorated the man and his deeds. To the best of my knowledge, Dan Kurzman's Soldier of Peace: The Life of Yitzhak Rabin (HarperCollins), is the first biography about Israel's first sabra leader since he was shot in Tel Aviv on Nov. 4, 1995. It is a workmanlike book designed for the general reader. And while Kurzman – an American writer – tries mightily to be objective, Soldier of Peace is unabashedly pro-Rabin.

Striking a hagiographic note early on, he observes: "After David Ben-Gurion, the founder of Israel, Rabin may well be judged the greatest leader in Israel's history..." Although it is a debatable point, Kurzman presents a compelling case, focusing on Rabin's contribution to Israel's victory in the Six Day War and on his role as prime minister in bringing the Oslo accords to a degree of fruition.

For all his achievements as a general and a statesman, Rabin was, as Kurzman correctly notes, a study in contradictions. He had a hawkish reputation, yet he signed an agreement with the PLO. He was shy and uncharismatic, yet he exuded a certain natural magnetism.

In the final analysis, Rabin was a pragmatist insofar as his views on peace were concerned. He was big on security, but he realized that territorial compromise was in Israel's long-range interests. He knew that if it ruled the Palestinians, Israel would ultimately evolve into a binational state.

Kurzman is also right when he says that Rabin's story is a mirror reflection of Israel's history.

Rabin was born in 1922, when Palestine was a British mandate torn by Arab-Jewish confrontations. His parents, Nehemiah and Rosa, were Russian Jews animated by the allure of Zionism.

Appointed second-in-command of the Palmach's First Battalion at the age of 23, Rabin compiled a distinguished military record during the War of Independence. But as he later admitted, he drove 50,000 Arab civilians from their homes in Lod (Lydda) and Ramle into Jordan. Shortly afterward, as a delegate at the 1949 Rhodes conference, he refused to sign the armistice agreement with Egypt, arguing that Israel should retain the Gaza Strip. (When he was prime minister for the second time around after 1992, he modified his view of Gaza's value to Israel's security.)

During the post-war years, Rabin rose in the ranks while many of his fellow Palmachniks left the army. In 1959, he was appointed chief of operations, and in this capacity, he tried to convince Ben-Gurion to switch most of Israel's arms business from France to the United States. He swayed Ben-Gurion, but angered deputy defence minister Shimon Peres, with whom he was to have an unsettling relationship.

Some of the finest chapters in Soldier of Peace turn on the period before and during the Six Day War. As chief of staff, Rabin devised a piecemeal strategy toward Egypt. Burdened by the casualties his troops had sustained in the 1948 war, Rabin was reluctant to take on the Egyptians in one swift stroke, favoring a phased campaign.

This, of course, was not to be. Several of his generals, notably Ariel Sharon, opposed the scheme. And after Rabin's nervous breakdown (or severe state of exhaustion) in the days preceding the outbreak of hostilities, Ezer Weizman, the head of operations, persuaded the general staff to enlarge the plan.

Whatever Rabin's condition, Kurzman suggests that Ben-Gurion had triggered it because he had chastised Rabin for having mobilized the army too soon.

As well, he claims that Rabin had to plead with Moshe Dayan, the defence minister, to capture the Golan Heights from Syria. Dayan mistakenly feared that Syria's ally, the Soviet Union, would intervene on its side.

As Israel's ambassador to the United States from 1968 to 1973, Rabin left a solid legacy. By far his most important achievement was to help elevate Israel into America's strategic ally. In addition, Rabin turned the trickle of U.S. aid into a torrent, and set a precedent for Israeli access to the White House.

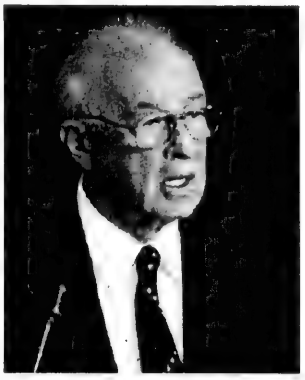
Aside from his decision to resign as prime minister in 1977 following the disclosure that his wife Leah had kept an illegal dollar account in the United States, the toughest chapter of his life was the Yom Kippur War.

Rabin spent hours at military headquarters in Tel Aviv, but was virtually ignored. Yet, because he had not been smeared by that war, he was chosen to replace Golda Meir, the discredited prime minister.

As premier, Rabin picked up the pieces, signing disengagement pacts with Egypt and Syria. But he miscalculated by leaving Jordan out of the equation. The U.S. secretary of state, Henry Kissinger, had called on Israel to withdraw from Jericho, and let Jordan administer this West Bank town. If Rabin had accepted this far-reaching proposal, he might have strengthened Jordan's position in the Arab world at the expense of the PLO.

Throughout the 1970s and 1980s, Rabin moved steadily to the right. He criticized Peres, his rival, for suggesting that Israel should be ready to negotiate with any Palestinian representatives who recognized its existence. And he excluded the PLO as a negotiating partner, belligerently declaring that Israel and the PLO could meet only on the battlefield.

In 1982, Rabin reluctantly accepted Menachem Begin's 40-kilometre incursion into Lebanon. But he deplored the idea of a full-scale Israeli invasion to bring about a new political order in Lebanon and to destroy the PLO. However, he urged Sharon, the then-defence minister, to tighten the disastrous siege of Beirut.



Yitzhak Rabin

From 1984 to 1990, Rabin was defence minister in the national unity government, led successively by Peres and Yitzhak Shamir. When the Palestinian revolt in the territories (the intifadah) erupted in December 1987, Rabin downplayed its gravity.

"Don't worry, it'll be quashed in a few days," he is reported to have boasted, hardly realizing that the rebellion would last until the first year of the Olso peace process, a development which Kurzman analyzes at length.

But as the insurrection spread, Rabin, who had promised to break the bones of Palestinian rock throwers, came to the belated conclusions that military means would not defuse the problem, and that Israel was locked in a battle with Palestinian nationalism.

By 1992, when he was campaigning for the premiership, Rabin's conception of peace had undergone a sea change. As he put it: "I am unwilling to give up a single inch of Israel's security, but I am willing to give up many inches of settlements and territories... for the sake of peace... We seek a territorial compromise which will bring peace and security."

Regettably, he was killed before he could put his policy fully into place. One wonders how he would have fared.

Caught in an 'abyss of despair'

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

As we remember the six million during Holocaust Education Week, it may be instructive to recall another historic tragedy, occasioned by the Chmielnicki massacres of 1648 to 1658, which is often regarded as a precursor to the Holocaust.

One of the classic texts of Jewish martyrology, Yeven Metzulah (The Abyss of Despair) by Rabbi Nathan Hanover, presents a graphic and gripping account of the horrors that occurred in Ukraine and eastern Poland when Bogdan Chmielnicki led the Cossacks into attack.

Tatars from the Caucaucus region joined the Ukrainians in their nationalistic rebellion against the Polish nobility and their largely Jewish landlords. By conservative estimates, at least 100,000 Jews were slaughtered.

Hanover fled Ostrog with his family as the Cossacks approached, and he became an itinerant preacher. Despite the tempestuous times, he managed to write several books, of which Yeven Metzulah is by far the most well known.

So popular did Yeven Metzulah become, according to historian William Helmreich, that in some communities of Eastern Europe it was customary to read it annually during the traditional "three weeks" in summer, and new editions often appeared after each new wave of persecution – right up until the Ukrainian pogroms that occurred during and following WWI. (The English translation excerpted below, by Abraham Mesch, was published by Transaction Books in 1983.)

Hanover's graphic and gripping account contains descriptions of individual atrocities on a par with anything the Nazis would later devise. It also relates many tales of Jewish heroism in the face of unspeakable cruelty.

In Tulczyn, the Ukrainians assembled the Jews in an enclosed garden, where several rabbis exhorted the community not to abandon their faith despite the threat of death. Three times, the Cossacks told the Jews, "Whoever wishes to change his faith and remain alive, let him sit under this banner." Not one Jew moved. Eventually, the Cossacks attacked and "approximately 1,500 souls perished by all sorts of terrible deaths."

In some towns, women escaped certain rape by jumping into moats surrounding the fortress-walls; many drowned or were stabbed in the water. Hanover tells of a beautiful maiden from a wealthy family whom a Cossack forced to become his wife.

"But before they lived together she told him with cunning that she possessed a certain magic and that no weapon could harm her. 'If you do not believe me, just test me,' she said. 'Shoot at me with a gun, and you will see that I will not be harmed.' The Cossack, her husband, in his simplicity, thought she was telling the truth. He shot at her with his gun and she fell and died for the sanctification of the name, to avoid being defiled by him, may God avenge her blood."

As the invaders besieged one Jewish village after another (more than 700 in total), the villagers fled. "Whoever had a horse and cart travelled in it. Those who did not possess a horse and cart, even though they had sufficient money to buy them, would not wait, but took wife and children by the hand and fled on foot, casting away all belongings."

Hanover describes roads clogged with horses and carts and refugees on foot, the air charged with wild rumors and panic. "Everyone threw from his cart silver and gold, vessels, books, pillows and bed covers in order to be able to escape more quickly, to save the lives of his family. The field was cluttered with gold, silver and clothes, and no Jew paused to take them."

For centuries before the Chmielnicki massacres, Jews had been moving eastward across Europe from Spain, Alsace and the Rhineland into Poland and Turkey. After 1648, the eastward trend was reversed. Many historians have suggested that the abyss of despair into which the Jews fell after 1648 set the stage for the emergence of the false messiah Shabbetai Tsvi about 1666, and for the revolutionary chassidic movement of the next century.

"The brutality of Chmielnicki made the work of the Nazis that much easier," Helmreich observes. "As we read Hanover's description of the atrocities committed by Chmielnicki and his hordes, it becomes clear that Hitler's torture chambers were only technological refinement – the precedent had already been set."

Naming your Jewish baby

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Abraham, Isaac, Jacob.
Arik, Ilan, Yarkon.
Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel, Leah.
Shachar, Revital, Raya, Lilach.

Whether you want to give your baby a biblical name or use something a bit less traditional, a wealth of suggestions is waiting for you on the Jewish Highway. Today, I would like to tour some of sites and look at Jewish baby naming customs.

According to tradition, the choice of a Jewish name has great significance. Philadelphia Cantor Mark Kirshblum puts it very well [http://members.aol.com/cantork/naming.htm]: "The name of a person describes his or her essence. It provides identity and generational connection. It begins the process of shaping a human being. Choosing a name empowers parents with creativity, just as God empowered Adam when He assigned him the first independent human act, the task of naming the beasts of the field, the birds of the sky and every living thing... A name can be a portent for the future or a wish that the person live up to the potential expressed in the meaning of the name. It is important, therefore, to give much thought to a child's shem kodesh, sacred or Hebrew name."

Although Ashkenazi Jews have traditionally named children after a deceased relative, Sephardim may honor a living family member [http://www.pop.virtual.co.il/depts/torah/lifecycle/name.htm].

Sometimes, the baby may be named after a great rabbi or after an event.

A baby born on Shabbat might be called Shabbatai, or a girl born on Chanukah could be called Meira ("she lights"). Other popular sources are Israeli plant, tree and place names, historical figures and animals [http://www.ritualr.com/babynames.shtml]. Dr. Cleveland Evans of the American Name Society warns against going with a faddish name which may not be appropriate a quarter century from now [http://www.jdl.org/names.html].

There are several excellent places to get ideas for names. Babynamer.com isn't a Jewish site, but it does index over 500 Hebrew names [http://www.babynamer.com/]. You can even specify the first letter of the name and how many syllables you are looking for. With each name, you are given a definition. For example, Savyon is "the groundsel, a plant with rays of yellow flowers." Liora is "God's gift of light to me."

If you're still stuck for a name, check out BabyCenter [http://www.babycenter.com/babyname/index.html] and its Jewish name discussion area [http://www.babycenter.com/bbs/2057/thread313/index.html]. The Babies Planet has links to many other baby naming sites [http://www.thebabiesplanet.com/bbnames.shtml] .

Finally, some controversial advice from Rabbi Bradley Shavit Artson. Many people spend a great deal of effort trying to find a non-Jewish equivalent to a Jewish name. Rabbi Artson urges parents to consider giving their children Hebrew names only, particularly when naming a baby after an honored relative [http://jewishfamily.com/scripts/NewJFL/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=1036].

"There are no English equivalents [to Hebrew names]," Rabbi Artson says. "A name is a name, and a translation is no longer the same. It is a matter of Jewish comfort and pride that we no longer have to mask our Jewish identities with a gentile name... So please do seriously consider giving that gift of self-esteem and pride by having your child's Jewish name be the only name."

The Jews of Babylon

By SMADAR MEIRI-ORDYNANS

The Jews of Babylon were exiled from the ancient land of Israel in 586 BCE after the destruction of the Temple. About 1,300 years later, when the Muslim Arabs invaded the regions of Mesopotamia and Persia in the first Islamic conquest, Babylonian Jewry numbered over one million.

The Jews welcomed the invasion with financial and military assistance, because during the century before this period, Babylonian Jews had been persecuted by the Zoroastrians of Persia. Much of this is documented in a historical letter known as the Iggereth of Sherira Gaon (656-661 CE). (To put things into perspective, in December 499 CE, the Babylonian Talmud was completed.)

Jews continued to be significantly involved in the development of the region during the Abbassid Empire, the Mongolian invasion, and the Ottoman periods. In fact, the first finance minister in the new Kingdom of Iraq during King Feisal's reign was a Jew.

Over the centuries, Jewish institutions such as yeshivot, synagogues and day schools flourished in great numbers. In Baghdad alone, there were 50 synagogues and four secondary Jewish schools by 1950. The Iraqi Jewish community prospered and contributed to the economic, social and political spectrums, while being given the religious freedom to practise all aspects of Jewish rituals and customs.

For many years now, my father and his contemporaries have argued that essentially, the Iraqi Jewish community led a relatively harmonious life until the conflict in Palestine in the 1930s.

Among the many accounts of life in Iraq and immigration to Israel written by Iraqi Jews is one documented by Shlomo Hillel, who was born in Baghdad and is a former speaker of the Knesset. Hillel wrote a best-selling first-hand account of the Babylonian and Iranian Jewish dramatic escapes in Operation Babylon (1988).

But for me, and even closer to home, my father, Avner Meiri, wrote a number of short stories in Waters of Babylon (1996), describing the livelihood of the Jewish community in Iraq.

One story which particularly amused me was Checkmate. In July 1946, my father and a friend were chosen to attend a high school summer camp where they were the only Jews among 300 Iraqi Arab students. In the story, my father describes the hospitality of the royal family – 11-year-old King Faisal II and his uncle, the Regent Amir Abdul-Ilah, when the camp students were occasional guests at the royal summer palace.

That summer, as a competitor in a chess tournament, my father was fortunate enough to play against the regent in the finals. The regent made a miscalculated move and was most astonished to lose to my father. This is one of the charming anecdotes my father relates; however, sadly, 12 years later, in 1958, the entire Iraqi royal family was killed by the army.

From 1949 to 1952, 130,000 Iraqi Jews immigrated to Israel – the second largest Sephardi immigration after that of Moroccan Jewry. The majority of Iraqi Jews today reside in Israel, the United States, England and Canada. In Israel, there are 250,000 Iraqi Jews, many of whom live in Ramat Gan. There are 50,000 Iraqi Jews in the Diaspora.

There are five Iraqi Jewish members of Knesset, including Yitzhak Mordechai, the minister of defence. In addition, Moshe Levy was a former chief of staff, and Mordechai Ben Porat a former member of Knesset. Ben Porat assisted in founding the museum and cultural centre, the Babylonian Heritage Centre in Or Yehuda, Israel.

Of the 9,000 Jews who remained in Iraq after the establishment of Israel, today there are fewer than 80 Jews, most of whom are elderly. The demise of Babylonian Jewry in Iraq has brought an end to historical eras of glory, tranquillity and oppression for over 2,500 years.

Covenant binds our families

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

This month, we read several chapters that begin to move us through the early generations of our ancestors. As we become acquainted with Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca, and Jacob and Rachel and Leah, the question of the progress made by each generation comes to the forefront.

Are these parallel couples that grapple with the same issues again and again? Is there growth or change that can be observed as the covenant with God is forming? Many times it appears that the same mistakes are made over and over. Each of the couples deals with infertility in one form or another. Each of the couples deals with internal family strife, and problems are never resolved easily.

It has become fashionable of late to focus on the difficulties these families endured. Time and again, I hear people commenting on how "dysfunctional" these early generations were. It has almost become politically incorrect to defend our patriarchs and matriarchs, as those who do open themselves to accusations of close-mindedness.

Of course I am not advocating promoting our ancestors to sainthood, since only quite recently do we ponder the paradox of a Jewish saint. However, I suggest we look closely at these generations, for although their troubles were many and they made their mistakes, there is still tremendous development and learning.

One of the best examples of growth is seen through observing how they deal with one of life's most difficult challenges: infertility.

Abraham and Sarah reach old age and are still unable to have a child together. At one point, Abraham turns to God and asks what good there is in all the wealth and the Divine promises of covenant if he has no children who will inherit. His point is well taken – a covenant with God, an Infinite Being, is unbalanced if we remain finite by nature. A person's connection to immortality is through their children. Abraham points out to God that without children, he is truly mortal and the covenant will end.

Although understandable, the midrash criticizes Abraham for his words. It is not the concept that is objectionable; rather that he pleads only on his own behalf and omits mention of Sarah. His exclusion of Sarah ultimately leads to the misunderstanding that introduces Hagar into the picture. The scenario that results from this is filled with pain and confusion for the family.

One generation later, Isaac and Rebecca find themselves in the same predicament – they are infertile. However, the midrash states that Isaac prays to God and asks that whatever children he will have should come only from his righteous wife Rebecca. Rebecca likewise prays to God and asks that whatever children she will have should come only from her righteous husband Isaac. It is this plea for each other that results in the birth of two babies.

We see through this single example how these early generations grew through previous experience. Abraham and Sarah struggled to fit themselves into covenant individually, and it tore their family apart. Isaac and Rebecca understood that covenant with God is the frame that must bind our families together. Hardly a dysfunctional concept.

Kristallnacht marked start of Holocaust

By ALVIN FINKEL

Sixty years ago, on Nov. 10, 1938, the Nazi party unleashed its worst violence to that point against the Jews of Germany.

While Nazi legislation from 1933 onwards stripped the Jews of their civil rights, it was on the infamous Kristallnacht that the Nazis made plain their intention to gradually eliminate the Jews of Germany altogether.

A distraught Polish Jew had murdered a minor official in the German Embassy in France. In retaliation, the Nazis unleashed a country-wide reign of terror against German Jews. Over 100 were murdered and thousands were beaten as the Nazis destroyed Jewish residential and commercial properties, leaving the trail of broken glass that gave the name Kristallnacht to that horrible day.

It has long been argued that the infamous policies of appeasement followed by Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain of Britain and Prime Minister Edouard Daladier of France emboldened the Nazis to act so flagrantly against the German Jews.

At Munich, on Sept. 29, just six weeks before Kristallnacht, Chamberlain and Daladier had joined with Hitler and Mussolini to sign the infamous Munich Agreement that dismembered Czechoslovakia.

Indeed, a close analysis of the foreign policy document of Britain, France, Germany and the United States reveals just how much store Chamberlain, in particular, placed upon Munich. Much of the British elite had heaved a sigh of collective relief as Hitler took power. They regarded him as a savior of Europe beset by communists and socialists, and made no effort to discourage his furious re-arming of Germany in contravention of the Versailles agreements.

At three meetings in September 1938, of which Munich was the third, Chamberlain and Hitler agreed that Germany could have a "free hand" in central and eastern Europe provided that it left the West alone. Germany would take control of the Soviet Union, and rid the world of Communist menace.

But what was to be the fate of the Jews of eastern Europe as the Nazis asserted their dominance over the eastern half of the continent? Or indeed, of the Jews of Germany? This issue appeared to be of no moment to the leaders of Britain and France, who never raised it before the massive public revulsion in their countries following Kristallnacht forced them to give the issue at least some attention.

Some attention but not much. The British government was made aware of the meaning of Kristallnacht by its officials in Germany. Britain's ambassador to Germany, Sir Nevile Henderson, was pro-Nazi and had made overtly anti-Semitic comments in his dispatches to the secretary for foreign affairs. He was however in Britain on a medical leave and his replacement, Sir G. Ogilvie-Forbes, was left to inform the British government on the significance of Kristallnacht.

He wrote: "I think that the murder of Herr von Rath by a German born Polish Jew has only accelerated the process of elimination of the Jews, which has for long been planned. This project, had it proceeded according to schedule, was cruel enough, but the opportunity offered by Grynszpan's criminal act has let loose forces of medieval barbarism."

Chamberlain however, did not want to be pushed off course from the pact that he had made at Munich. Air Minister Sir Kingsley Wood reported his reaction as: "Oh, what tedious people these Germans can be!...Just when we were beginning to make a little progress."

Chamberlain did hope to get the "tedious" Nazis to make some concessions regarding the Jews, in return for British support of German claims in central and eastern Europe. A few weeks after Kristallnacht, he met with South Africa's minister of defence, who was en route to meetings with the German leaders. The minister was German-born and anti-Semitic. But he agreed to take Chamberlain's proposal to Hitler.

Chamberlain's Sweetner

Briefly, the British prime minister favored an evacuation of German Jews to Madagascar or some other African location. Wealthy Jews abroad would have to pay for the evacuation, and half the property of each German Jew would be left behind. This proposal would have given Hitler a Judenrein (Jew-free) Germany, while allowing the German Jews to live.

Chamberlain's sweetener was that if Hitler co-operated, Britain would support German claims in Danzig and the Polish Corridor. But, while Goering was interested in Chamberlain's proposal, both Hitler and his foreign minister, von Ribbentrop, were not. They told the South African minister to tell the British that the fate of the German Jews was an internal matter, to be decided by the German government alone. But the reality was that they were aware that Chamberlain was not going to fight them over the fate of the Jews. The British were bending over backwards to extend the understanding that Munich had embodied.

Daladier was, if anything, more callous about the fate of the Jews than Chamberlain. Two weeks after Kristallnacht, as he discussed with Chamberlain his plans for a Friendship Agreement with Germany along the lines of a Friendship Agreement Chamberlain and Hitler signed the day after Munich, Daladier indicated that the assassination of the German official in France had set back the date of the signing of the agreement. But he made no reference to Kristallnacht as a setback.

Indeed, the agreement was signed on Dec. 6. Daladier's Radical party had an important anti-Semitic faction and Daladier, though he had never personally made anti-Semitic statements publicly or privately, had never disciplined or even denounced the anti-Semites in his party.

As we remember the horrors of Kristallnacht, it is important to remember as well, the callousness of the response of the heads of Europe's two largest democracies.

Concerned with making Hitler their partner in grand plans to rout Europe's social revolutionaries, the leaders of Britain and France were, if not completely uncaring about the Jews, not very concerned. Before long, they would learn that Hitler was not a dependable ally, and that he was making plans to attack Western countries before he set out to create lebensraum for Germany by establishing German control over the eastern half of the continent.

But Hitler's cruelty towards the Jews would play no role in either Britain's or France's eventual decision to go to war with him. Kristallnacht had no discernible importance in unravelling the agreement made at Munich.

Holocaust bill causes stir, but heads to passage

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There will be no committee hearings on Bill 66, which would establish Holocaust Memorial Day in Ontario.

Last Thursday, the legislature unanimously passed a Liberal motion to dispense with committee hearings, and proceed directly to third and final reading, meaning the bill could become law in the coming weeks.

Earlier this month, the bill passed second reading with all-party support [CJN, Oct. 15].

If passed in its current form, it would establish Yom Hashoah as it falls on the Jewish calendar, as an official day of remembrance and education in Ontario. The province would become the first jurisdiction in North America to officially mark a day dedicated to the Holocaust and genocide.

Conservatives angry

But prior to the move to dispense with committee hearings, angry Conservatives accused a Liberal colleague of using the legislation as a political football.

They said Annamarie Castrilli delivered a cheap shot with a press release accusing the governing Tories of stalling on Bill 66.

For two weeks, the bill was before the standing committee on social development, which is chaired by Castrilli.

Castrilli, the Liberal member for Downsview, sent out a statement earlier last week saying that since Oct. 8, she had scheduled two meetings of the standing committee, "but the government's lead member on the committee has cancelled on both occasions and refused to send a representative.

"We don't understand the government's reasons for not scheduling committee hearings... I thought the government was interested in moving this bill forward," read her statement, which is headed Government Stalls on Bill 66.

But an irate Ted Chudleigh, the Tory MPP who sponsored the Holocaust bill, denounced Castrilli in the legislature for "political gamesmanship at its worst" and being "sloppy."

He said Bill 66 had not reached the standing committee's agenda, which, as chair, Castrilli controls.

"How can the government be stalling when the chair of the committee does not schedule the bill for discussion?" he asked.

Chudleigh told The CJN he was "very confused" by Castrilli's press release. "I don't know what motivated her. I'm pretty upset with her."

Jack Carroll, the lead Tory on the committee, also told The CJN that Castrilli had never scheduled Bill 66 for discussion.

"She [Castrilli] sets the agenda, and it has never been a topic of discussion. I'm not sure where she's coming from.

"I don't like playing politics with important things," said Carroll. "I'm just disgusted by it."

Simon Burke, an aide to citizenship minister Isabel Bassett, under whose ministry the bill would fall, called Castrilli's action "kind of a low move, and a bit of a see-through one."

Earlier this year, Castrilli openly defied Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty by announcing she will oppose Monte Kwinter for the Liberal nomination in York Centre in the next election. McGuinty has endorsed Kwinter in the heavily Jewish riding.

But Castrilli defended herself on the Holocaust bill, saying the government could have easily called for it to be placed before the committee.

"The agenda can always be changed," she told The CJN. "The government whip could have said, 'Hey, I don't see Bill 66 here.' "

Castrilli fired off a three-page letter to Chudleigh, saying she "could not believe the unwarranted attacks" he made the day before in the legislature, and explaining why the bill was not scheduled for discussion.

Castrilli said she was "quite delighted" with the decision to waive committee hearings on the bill.

Edith Kursbatt (right) and Susan Fenwick study for their bat mizvahs.

Baycrest's bat mitzvah 'girls' begin studying

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Edith Kursbatt didn't have a bat mitzvah. But then, in London in 1925, no girls did.

"It was not for females to do," says Kursbatt, a spry 85-year-old, in a genteel, upper-class English accent. "We did have inquiring minds, but it didn't help.

"No one had a bat mitzvah in those days. It was thought to emulate the gentiles."

So 73 years later, Kursbatt has joined 10 of her neighbors at the Baycrest Terrace and 11 members of Baycrest's Women's Auxiliary (WA) to study for one big joint bat mitzvah.

Each participating Terrace resident has been paired with a member of the WA for the duration of the project, which will focus on women of the Bible. The classes will be taught by Jewish educator Rachael Turkienicz.

Last week's inaugural session kicked off with a discussion on the nature of God and free will.

Jewishly, there was little free will for Kursbatt when she was growing up in London in the first quarter of this century.

She was raised in an Orthodox home in which a feared "but revered" great-uncle called the religious shots. "Women were to do what they had done for thousands of years," she recalls. "I suppose it was a prejudice.

"But I have a lot of questions about the Bible. I always look for the logic in things," says the great-grandmother of five.

Kursbatt's study buddy is Susan Fenwick, president-elect of the WA.

Fenwick, now 49, remembers that when she was 12, girls in Toronto had bat mitzvahs, both in Reform and Conservative synagogues.

"But I didn't continue with my Hebrew education," she says.

Some of the participating residents are well into their 90s. Some are also Holocaust survivors.

The program will culminate in a bat mitzvah ceremony next April 16 at the Baycrest Terrace synagogue.

Community Matters

Record North American UJA Contributions

UJA campaigns across North America are reporting record breaking support following several years of modest growth - and Toronto's community Campaign for Fifty, now in its eighth week, is leading the way. Atlanta, Baltimore, Pittsburgh and Detroit are among U.S. cities outperforming previous years.

All Time Highs

Recent statistics published by UJA Federations of North America show 42 campaigns recording all-time highs. The UJA Federation system in the United States is poised to top $750 million this year - up by $20 million from last year - a new high in U.S. Jewish philanthropy.

Toronto's community Campaign for Fifty has already surpassed $27 million on its way to raising $50 million annually by 2001 - with contribution increases averaging 22%.

Based on an unprecedented process of community consultation, the campaign will allocate $13.5 million in additional funds to strengthen Jewish identity, assist the vulnerable and rescue Jews in danger around the world.

Clear Objectives

Larry Tanenbaum, Co-Chair of the Campaign for Fifty with Brent Belzberg, cites a focused campaign with clear, understandable objectives among the factors contributing to its current success.

In the U.S., UJA National Chair Carole Solomon attributes what she labels "an extraordinary campaign" to a strong economic climate combined with back-to -basics fundraising. "It's about UJA Federation's enduring relevance, scope and effectiveness."

Broader Benefits

"There's a growing realization across North America that gifts to a central UJA Federation campaign can spread more benefits to more Jews than any other donations," says Toronto's Tanenbaum.

"Local Jewish communities across North America have made the statement that our system is the best way of guaranteeing that the most people will be helped by their generosity," adds Richard Wexler, President of UJA in the United States.

The Toronto UJA Federation campaign will soon surpass Los Angeles, ranking it among North America's top three in total giving.

It's Your Call

To ensure the Campaign for Fifty's success and to assist UJA Federation in maintaining and increasing support for beneficiary agencies suffering from severe government cutbacks, a week of Phoning for Fifty telethons is taking place, November 15-19.

"The more people we have making calls to raise money, the closer we are to making sure our agencies can continue to provide vital services to thousands in need," says Marlene Axmith, who is co-chairing the telethons with Cheryl Jackson and Richard Sadowski.

"There are people out there who are ready to make a contribution - they just need to be called," adds Jackson

The last set of Phoning for Fifty telethons in October contributed over $630,000.

Families with three or more generations at the November telethons will be eligible to win a free photo session courtesy of Stephen Epstein at Big Dipper Communications.

For every pledge card completed by a volunteer campaigner, his or her name will be entered into a draw to win a free round trip ticket to Israel, compliments of Air Canada.

To sign up for day or evening Phoning for Fifty telethon shifts, November 15 - 19, please call (416) 635-2883 ext. 115.

While in town, Shachar, who opened for Canadian legend Neil Young during his Israeli tour, also made her local debut at Lee's Palace. "Music has always been part of my life," says Ronit. "I started playing at the age of 10. I knew this is what I wanted to do."

Station apologizes for bumping show

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Viewers who expected to watch a Jewish program last Saturday night on a new Christian-oriented television channel, were instead treated to a kippah-wearing singer praising Jesus Christ.

The mix-up occurred on the new Crossroads channel (CTS – cable 9 in Toronto), which went on the air Sept. 30. Last Saturday, instead of the regularly scheduled program Passages, in which Tanach scholar Michael Kigel leads Bible discussions from the Jewish perspective, viewers got Marty Goetz, a well-known performer on the Hebrew-Christian circuit.

In the previously taped show, the kippah-clad Goetz plays piano and sings before a studio audience. But between numbers, he discusses his belief in Jesus.

"It was blatant proselytizing," said Rabbi Michael Skobac, director of education for the counter-missionary group Jews for Judaism.

"We got calls [of protest]," he said. "People were ballistic."

Kigel told The CJN he didn't mind being pre-empted, "but this is a question of misrepresentation" because Goetz's show "appropriated all kinds of Jewish symbols," including the Star of David.

Kigel said both Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and Jews for Judaism had objected to Goetz's show in earlier meetings with the station's chairman of the board, David Mainse, who is also the founder of the Christian show 100 Huntley Street.

The station has issued a written apology to Kigel and to Howard Adelman, host of the station's Israel Today program, in which it says it made "a serious error" in scheduling the Goetz concert in place of Passages.

The letter says the station is "embarking on a serious effort to be balanced and fair, and our respect for the Jewish community is sincere in every way."

CTS will no longer air the Goetz concert, and will not allow members of any religion to use the symbols of another "as a result of this faux pas," the station's general manager, Wendell Wilks, told The CJN.

Wilks said Kigel's show, slotted for Saturdays at 10 p.m., was scheduled to be pre-empted the night of Oct. 24.

"But to do it with [Goetz's] show was just insensitive and careless," he conceded. "Viewers were confused and misled, and that's improper."

He said the station has a strict policy against proselytizing.

If the station has to pre-empt a Jewish program in the future, "we'll do it with another Jewish program."

He attributed the foul-up to the new channel's "growing pains."

Messianic Times is back

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and Jews for Judaism have received about a dozen protest calls each over the latest edition of the Messianic Times, which was again delivered to Jewish neighborhoods in Toronto.

It was the third time in six months that copies of the U.S.-produced messianic paper were distributed locally.

The slick, 32-page publication is filled with Jewish-themed stories. But a closer read reveals its message: that "Yeshua" (Jesus) is the true Jewish messiah.

A front-page article, written by the paper's freelance editor, who lives in Vernon, B.C. alleges that up to 25,000 Jews in Ethiopia have been "abandoned" by Israel.

Other articles focus on messianic activities, but nowhere does the word Jesus appear.

In the past, the paper has been denounced by Jewish organizations as a tool to convert Jews to Christianity.

CJC's Ontario region says the latest issues were dropped off in Bathurst Manor, which has a high concentration of Jewish residents.

About 1,000 copies of the paper's spring edition were delivered to Toronto. Over the summer, some 5,000 copies of the next issue were hand-delivered to Jewish homes in Thornhill, Downsview and Willowdale to spread the group's message.

"People are very upset" at having been targeted by the publication, said Rabbi Michael Skobac. He said the paper was distributed by members of two local messianic congregations: City of David in Thornhill and Congregation Melech Yisrael in Toronto.

The CJN's calls to the paper's editor were referred to Zev Isaacs, who founded the publication in Toronto in 1990, and moved it to Pennsylvania three years ago.

An employee said Isaacs was in Israel "on business." – R.C.

ORT launches Chumash on CD

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — The first complete multimedia version of the Chumash, Navigating the Bible, had its Canadian launch recently in Toronto.

The software – contained on a single CD-ROM – includes transliterations of the Hebrew text, blessings on the Torah and Haftorah and audio cantorial chanting with musical scores.

It also includes a complete English translation of The Living Torah, edited by Rabbi Aryeh Kaplan, with footnotes and pictures.

The software was developed by World ORT (Organization for educational Resources and Technological Training) Union in London, England.

Among its other features are tutorials on how to read the Torah and Haftorot; a calendar to find the readings for a bar or bat mitzvah (or any weekly reading); a glossary of people, places, plants and animals in the Torah; divrei Torah for each parshah and a search facility to find words in the text.

The launch was hosted by the Reena Foundation at its Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre.

Gord Berger, president of Toronto ORT said, "We're so pleased to finally be able to share the launch of this terrific educational tool with the community – it is a wonderful opportunity for those individuals who have not been able to benefit from these teachings to access them in an open and interactive manner."

To demonstrate the multimedia software, Elaine Todres, president of the Baycrest Centre Foundation served as chazzan, and called on four guests to participate in a symbolic reading of their parshah using the software.

The bnei/bnot mitzvah were: Izzie Light, an orphaned survivor from Prague who attended an ORT school in London, England after the war; survivor Lazar Greisdorf, who came to Canada in 1948 at the age of 12; Martin Goodman, 52, a Reena client who told The CJN he would like to learn to read Torah using the software; and Etta Ginsberg-McEwan, an activist for older women and people with disabilities and a retired former director of social work at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Kathleen Crook, president of ORT Canada said Navigating the Bible moves ORT into new frontiers in its work for Jewish continuity and Jewish education.

"This is a wonderful tool to educate young and old, particularly good for the smaller isolated Jewish communities." Crook noted that the CD-ROM has been translated into Russian and Spanish and will soon be available in other languages.

At the launch, Toronto ORT presented 20 Navigating the Bible CD-ROMs to local Jewish day schools, synagogues and community organizations.

Navigating the Bible is available at selected Judaica shops, or call Edna Levitt, director of development at Toronto ORT 787-0339. The internet web site for Navigating the Bible is [http://bible.ort.org/].

Black Tie Welcome

'God forbid!' says Dr. Ruth about retirement

Dinner to honor six women survivors

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ruth Westheimer, the diminutive, grey-haired sex therapist better known as Dr. Ruth, has recently completed a television documentary and two books on grandparenting.

So what would her own grandparents have thought of her career?

"As German Jews, they wouldn't believe what they were hearing – and then they would be very proud of me," she told The CJN recently, her accent and cheerful, brisk speaking manner unmistakable over the phone line from her New York home.

This week, Westheimer is in town as keynote speaker for a Nov. 4 dinner at the Sheraton Centre, sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem in cooperation with State of Israel Bonds, Women's division. The dinner honors six women Holocaust survivors – Anita Ekstein, Gerda Frieberg, Genia Grossman, Fanny Pillersdorf, Fay Schulman and Rose Ziner – for their contributions to the community.

Westheimer could also be called a Holocaust survivor, although she prefers the term "orphan of the Holocaust." At age 10, she was sent from her Orthodox Jewish home in Frankfurt to a Swiss orphanage, where she spent six years with other Jewish children fleeing the Nazis. She and her parents, who did not survive, corresponded for almost three years.

"I know I was spared some of the horrible experiences that other children had," she said. "First of all, by being alive...the other thing is, I was not in a camp."

Dr. Ruth Westheimer

An only child – now the mother of two grown children – she noted the sacrifice her parents and grandparents made to send her to safety.

At age 16, she moved to Israel where she fought with the Haganah, and was injured by an Arab bomb in 1948.

An early, brief marriage prompted a move to Paris, where she studied at the Sorbonne and taught kindergarten.

She completed her education – an MA in sociology and a doctorate in education – in the United States, where she has lived since 1956. A stint with Planned Parenthood prompted her to focus on human sexuality.

Westheimer didn't "become" Dr. Ruth – as she puts it – until 1980, when she launched the radio program Sexually Speaking.

Now an adjunct professor at New York University, Westheimer has become an internationally known personality through her writings (a syndicated column and 15 books to date) and television shows like Ask Dr. Ruth. "Even in Australia they recognize me," she said. "It's very nice."

In 1993, she had her own series in Hebrew on Israeli television.

In some ways, being Jewish has made it easier for her to talk about sexuality issues, she said. "For us as Jews, it has never been a sin to teach and talk about sex." She is the co-author of a book called Heavenly Sex, which describes sex in the Jewish tradition.

Today, at age 70, Westheimer maintains a private practice about six hours a week and has a number of projects on the go.

Has the thought of retiring crossed her mind? "God forbid!" she exclaimed, adding, however, that one has to respect one's age. She sleeps eight hours a night and has given up waterskiing – but not snow skiing.

Her work has helped her cope with the death of her husband of 36 years, Fred Westheimer. "It definitely helped me a great deal to be so very busy."

She has no intention of giving up sex therapy, despite the new direction some of her work has taken. Her recent grandparenting projects (the documentary No Missing Link, to be broadcast on PBS in New York City in December; and the books Grandparenthood and Dr. Ruth Talks About Grandparents: Advice For Kids On Making The Most of a Special Relationship) came about "because I'm now a grandparent [of three grandchildren, ages 8, 2 and 9 months]." She giggled. "It's very simple."

The memory of her own grandparents was also a factor, she said, turning serious. "They influenced me greatly in terms of Jewishness and values."

She is certain her grandparents would take pride not only in her celebrity, but in her active participation in her synagogue and her membership in a second synagogue. "They need the dues," she said. "And [my grandparents would be proud of my] being, for the sixth year, the president of the local Y [the YMHA of Washington Heights]."

She would advise young Jewish people today to "learn that you have to stand up and be counted if [anything like the Holocaust] happens to Jews or blacks or other groups. You have to do your part in terms of making sure that this does not happen again, and doesn't happen in other places."

Yad Vashem plays an important role, she noted, in keeping tradition and memories alive.

SHOCKING. POWERFUL. TRUE.

Betar-Tagar gets new shaliach

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Betar-Tagar is back in business with the arrival in September of shaliach Baruch Liverant.

Technically, the right-wing Zionist youth organization didn't close, but activities wound down after the departure of Liverant's predecessor Pini Ravid last December.

Although Betar-Tagar (the youth wing of Herut-Likud) operates in a handful of cities in the United States, Liverant is the only Betar-Tagar shaliach in North America.

"We felt it was very important that there be a positive activity on the various campuses to counteract some of the anti-Zionism...even anti-Semitism going on on some of the campuses," said Harry Wolle, president of central region, Herut-Likud.

Ravid's stint ended when Israel's Jewish Agency cut funding for his position. Liverant's position is funded locally by Herut-Likud.

Among the new shaliach's first tasks, he explained in a recent interview in Toronto's Herut-Likud office, which houses his own office, is revitalizing the Tagar chapters on local university campuses, beginning with York University and the University of Toronto. Upcoming Betar and Tagar conferences in the United States are on the agenda as well.

He is also focusing strongly on outreach to students in the Thornhill area, and he hopes to organize weekly Betar youth groups for high school students.

Depending on the knowledge level of the students, educational activities may focus on basic information about Judaism and Israel. "There are some [students] who don't even know where the cities in Israel are located."

During Ravid's shlichut, Tagar was involved in several political protests on issues such as Palestinian terrorism. Liverant will continue in that direction if he feels it's necessary, but said the main focus of his work will be educational, focused on establishing strong connections between Israel and the Jewish community here.

Baruch Liverant

Within the Jewish community, he meets regularly with shlichim from youth movements Habonim Dror and Canadian Young Judaea. It is only on "high politics" that they disagree, he noted.

In Israel, a difference of political opinion "doesn't mean both of the parties don't want a big strong country for Israel," he said. "I don't know if people abroad understand that completely."

Liverant, 28, was born in Kishinev and made aliyah as a small child. In 1983, his family and other non-religious settlers moved to Hermesh, outside the Green Line – with the approval of the left-wing Labor government, Liverant pointed out. He grew up in the Betar youth movement, the only one in his settlement.

A graduate of Tel Aviv University (TAU) in archeology and classical studies, Liverant has worked as a tour guide, a winter camp shaliach to the former Soviet Union and a social activities coordinator for American students studying at TAU. He also studied environmental education with the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel.

The Quebec provincial election just 25 days away will again be a pivotal one for the almost monolithically federalist Jewish community, a community that does not want to see the Parti Québécois (PQ) elected for a second term.

Commentary

Another PQ win Nov. 30 would mean at least four more years of dread over another possible referendum on Quebec secession – the province's third – even though Premier Lucien Bouchard has promised one only under "winning conditions."

Even if there is no referendum, a renewed PQ mandate would still mean, for the vast majority of weary Jewish Quebecers, more years of continued political uncertainty, more younger Jews leaving Quebec, more nationalist rhetoric on a regular basis, more time for the economy to suffer.

This uncertainty would linger, at a time when other issues – such as health and social services and the economy – rank much higher in the public mind than Quebec sovereignty.

Still, for the Jewish community, sovereignty remains the dominant issue.

Even if the community preferred the PQ's handling of the economy or its social policies, it would still vote Liberal, since the Liberals are federalists.

Popular vote split

At the time of this writing, most polls showed the Liberals under leader Jean Charest and Bouchard's PQ running in a virtual dead-heat in the popular vote – which would translate into a PQ victory because of the concentration of the Liberal vote in and around Montreal. The Liberals will need to lead by four or five percentage points to have a chance to form the next government.

A Liberal victory would also possibly produce a place in the cabinet for D'Arcy McGee incumbent Lawrence Bergman, who is a shoo-in in his riding. The last member of the Jewish community to serve there was Herbert Marx, also a D'Arcy McGee Liberal MNA, who was justice minister under premier Robert Bourassa.

Meanwhile, the organized Jewish community is galvanizing for election day – in fact it began doing so weeks before the election was actually called.

Unlike the 1995 referendum campaign, when it explicitly worked to keep Canada together and to get out the No vote, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) in Quebec, as its mandate dictates, will not endorse a specific political party.

Yet it is hardly a secret where its sympathies lie. As one source within CJC told The CJN, perhaps stating the obvious, the "spectre" of the PQ winning again, "makes the Jewish community more insecure than if the Liberals win."

The CJC in Quebec will not be advising people for whom to vote (not that it would even if it could) and everyone knows the Liberals will win in the usual stronghold ridings with significant Jewish populations like D'Arcy McGee. But the CJC in Quebec will be doing all it can to ensure that every member of the community – including snowbirds – votes, that the vote is informed, and that candidates from all parties in all ridings know where the Jewish community stands on several issues of relevance to it.

What that will mean in more concrete terms is that every candidate in Quebec will receive a bilingual copy of its Political Action Guide, which covers such issues as national unity, as well as the economy, education, health and social services, intercultural and inter-racial relations, immigration, anti-Semitism and racism, and human rights.

Representatives from Congress, including political action committee chairs Rita Tenenbaum and David Shapiro, will also be meeting with candidates from eight to 10 ridings with a so-called significant number of Jewish constituents – such as D'Arcy McGee, St. Laurent, Mont-Royal, Westmount, and Robert-Baldwin.

The Jewish community as a whole, however, will likely be more intrigued by two planned public events during the election campaign being coordinated between CJC-Q and FEDERATION CJA.

The first event, planned tentatively for a downtown location, will be geared for young people and take the form of a debate involving candidates or officials from from the Liberals, PQ and the Parti Action Democratique.

The second event, likely to be held in a venue like the Saidye Bronfman Centre, will also take the form of a debate on relevant election issues and feature candidates from the different parties.

Such events, Tenenbaum suggested at a recent meeting of the CJC-Q executive, have proven highly effective in getting the Jewish community more directly involved in the issues of the election campaign.

CLARIFICATION

An article in last week's CJN about the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre's embarking on a $3 million fundraising campaign to expand its services and facilities contained some inaccuracies. The centre is not a beneficiary agency of United Jewish Appeal, but rather a department of UJA Federation. As such, the federation pays the salaries of the centre's 2 ½ staff people, as well as other resources at the centre's disposal. The centre's annual programming budget is closer to $50,000, rather than the figure stated in the article, which was supplied by the centre. As well, the fundraising drive is being conducted through UJA Federation's Legacy Campaign.

Abortion MDs targeted

A fifth, unidentified U.S. doctor was shot in Richmond, N.Y. in 1997. Other abortion doctors have also been killed or wounded in bombing or shooting attacks in Pensacola, Florida, Boston and Birmingham, Ala.

Police and U.S. marshalls in Amherst stepped up security around a physician providing abortion services after an anti-abortion zealot called the Hamilton Spectator offices to say the Buffalo-area doctor was on a sniper's hit list. Earlier, a flyer with a picture of Slepian was left in the Hamilton police washroom. Slepian's face was crossed out with an X and the words "killer, Jew, Nazi" were written on it.

While not all abortion doctors singled out for attack were Jewish, the shootings of Slepian, Fainman, Romalis and Short share common elements: they were all shot through a window in their homes within a few days of Nov. 11, Canada's Remembrance Day.

Dr. Henry Morgantaler believes it's more than a coincidence that three of the doctors are Jewish.

"I have noticed it," Morgantaler said. "I don't rule out the possibility that the perpetrator is anti-woman and also anti-Semitic. The anti-Semitic part is nothing new to me. I've been insulted many time for being a Jew."

Morgantaler, who pioneered a woman's right to an abortion in Canada, said he doesn't believe Jewish doctors are providing abortion services out of proportion to their numbers in the general population of physicians. "But the people against abortion try to make an issue out of it. It's like a modern blood libel, blaming Jewish doctors for killing Christian children."

Mark Weintraub, national chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' community relations committee, adopted a more cautious approach.

"To date, we simply do not have any information available that would suggest that anti-Semitism is an additional motivating factor in the attacks on our doctors," he said. Nevertheless, he added, "we don't want to ignore the possibility of such a linkage."

Weintraub said Congress' staff "will be discussing this with police...Those are members of our community who have been attacked."

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, was also cautious in attributing anti-Semitic motivation to the shootings. But he urged police to follow up that angle. "If they fail to take it into consideration, they're failing to do their duty," he said.

Littman pointed out that right-wing extremists often link Jews to issues they oppose, whether it is farm foreclosures or abortion.

"The radical anti-abortion movement people could see Jews as perpetrators, and act against them," he suggested.

Staff-Sgt. Bill Vandergraaf, a member of a task force set up to investigate the shootings, said police were aware that three of the victims are Jewish. But "there's nothing in our investigation to suggest that is a motivation. We're not investigating it as a hate crime."

Speaking from the task force headquarters in Winnipeg, Vandergraaf said police are not convinced the poster left in the Hamilton police headquarters was connected to the shootings. It might have been left by radical elements that are not connected to the killings, he suggested.

Phil Baum, executive director of the American Jewish Congress (AJC), also dismissed suggestions someone was specifically targeting Jewish doctors. "I know of no police effort to identify Jewish doctors. I think the anger and outrage is directed at doctors doing abortion. I know of no reason to believe the motive [in the Slepian shooting] was anti-Semitism...I think it was coincidental that he was Jewish."

An AJC news release condemned "those who, in the name of 'a demonic religious belief' provide encouragement for the murderers even if not specifically calling for murder."

UBC scholarship created in name of female coach

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The recent creation of the Sandy Silver Endowment Volleyball Award marks the first time a scholarship fund has been established in the name of a woman coach, according to organizers.

A native of North York, Silver is former head coach of the University of British Columbia (UBC) women's volleyball team; she also coached the York University women's volleyball team in the late 1970s.

The fund is expected to provide two annual scholarships for outstanding women volleyball players enrolled at the university.

Erminia Russo, current head coach of the UBC women's volleyball team, said fundraising began in May 1998. The amount to be raised will be matched by UBC, Russo told The CJN. "The total should be enough for two $1,500 scholarships."

Fundraisers are about one-third of the way toward their goal, Russo said. The scholarships will be awarded to female volleyball players with outstanding ability who are good students and can demonstrate financial need.

The organizers hope the first scholarships will be awarded in September 1999, she added.

Russo explained why UBC chose to honor Silver: "Not only was Sandy the head coach of the UBC women's volleyball team, she has been involved in volleyball for many years. Sandy is a recognizable name in the sport, and she's still a big contributor."

Silver said UBC Athletics asked her about two years ago to let her name stand for the award. She was somewhat perplexed by the request. "It was a great honor, but I was also surprised, because scholarships are usually named for people who are dead," she explained. "And I am very much alive."

Silver said UBC decided to set up the scholarships because government support for athletics is expected to gradually disappear. "Financial assistance for university students who play competitive sports is necessary," she said. "They're trying to achieve excellence athletically and academically. That's a considerable burden. When they're not studying, they're training, and there's no time left for a job to earn money. The purpose of the scholarships is to give a few of them a boost."

Now living on the west side of Vancouver not far from UBC, Silver grew up in a Jewish neighborhood in North York and attended William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate. Her volleyball career began when she played on the Toronto Blues women's team in the late 1960s and early 1970s. She graduated from York University in the early 1970s with a degree in physical education.

After a short stint as a correctional officer, Silver went to Seneca College in North York as a full-time women's volleyball coach. Although she had never coached before, she enjoyed the job and her team had a good season.

In 1979, after four years as a part-time coach at York, Silver was offered a full-time position as head coach of the UBC women's volleyball team, becoming the only woman west of Ontario to hold a full-time volleyball coaching job.

In October 1983, Silver was diagnosed with leukemia, which forced her into premature retirement. Thanks to a bone marrow transplant from her sister, however, she managed to beat the disease. Although she no longer plays or coaches, Silver is still active in volleyball, sitting on boards and committees of B.C. and national organizations.

She also acts as an informal mentor to young people. "It's important for women who have been there to offer their advice to up-and-coming women, both on volleyball and on life," she said.

Silver goes back to Toronto "once or twice a year, to see my family and to go shopping." Her mother, Grace Minsk, brother Murray Silver and sister Linda Anderson all live in North York.

For information about the Sandy Silver Endowment Volleyball Award fund, contact Russo at 604-822-4646 or at [erusso@interchange.ubc.ca].

Rabbi charged with smuggling drugs

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Montreal rabbi has been released without bail after being criminally charged in New York state with smuggling illegal drugs into a prison where he serves as chaplain.

Rabbi Eli Gottesman, 73, pleaded not guilty in a U.S. federal court in Albany to the charge of attempting to provide contraband, a small quantity of cocaine and marijuana, to inmates of the medium-security Federal Correctional Institute in Ray Brook, in the Adirondacks.

Rabbi Gottesman, however, has not been indicted on this felony yet, said his lawyer Brian Premo. The U.S. District Attorney will have to decide if there is a strong enough case against him to take it to a grand jury for indictment, Premo said. He could not say when such a decision might be made.

Rabbi Gottesman has been commuting each week from Montreal to New York state for about 18 years to serve as chaplain to Jewish prisoners in several jails, as well as hospitals and nursing homes, and to serve the Anshe Zophen Synagogue in Ogdensburg, just over the border from Prescott, Ont.

At the time of his arrest, he was responsible for four state and one federal prison, and a psychiatric institution over a wide region of the northwestern part of the state. He had been working for the Ray Brook facility since 1991.

Reached by The CJN at his home in Ogdensburg, Rabbi Gottesman maintained he did not know he was carrying drugs. "My conscience is clear. God knows I have done nothing wrong. If I had known I had contraband I would never have touched it, not for a billion dollars."

Rabbi Gottesman was making a Sukkot visit at Ray Brook when he was arrested Oct. 7. In addition to the traditional lulav and etrog, Rabbi Gottesman brought with him a number of articles for various inmates, among them a bottle of shampoo.

In that bottle, a special agent of the U.S. Justice Department found the illicit drugs in balloons. "When he opened it and found the stuff, it was a shock to me," Rabbi Gottesman said.

Rabbi Gottesman told The CJN a certain prisoner had told him that he was losing his hair and needed a special shampoo. Rabbi Gottesman said the inmate told him his wife would send the shampoo to him to bring in.

Rabbi Gottesman said the package came to his home in Ogdensburg (a house belonging to the synagogue) apparently from the wife and he took it to Correctional Institute

At the same time, he also was delivering some inexpensive watches and non-prescription pills for stomach ailments that had been requested by other inmates. Rabbi Gottesman said he has regularly brought in items for the prisoners, particularly Jewish-style foods from Montreal, like bagels and hummus and holiday specialities, which he said he has paid for out of his own pocket.

"The only thing they told me is not to bring the bagels with black seeds," he said, because poppy may show up as heroin in drug tests. "Otherwise, I've never had any problem at any of the prisons."

Rabbi Gottesman was reportedly under investigation for several months by prison officials, as well as the Justice Department, Federal Bureau of Investigation and state police.

Rabbi Gottesman, who has dual citizenship, has no prior convictions, his lawyer confirmed. He faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Probably best known as the compiler of the Who's Who in Canadian Jewry last published in 1965, Rabbi Gottesman continues to maintain in Montreal the Canadian Jewish Literary Foundation, although it is no longer active.

He has gained recognition for his work among Jewish prisoners in New York state, and was named chaplain of the year by the New York Board of Rabbis in 1988, the first Canadian so honored. His innovative projects to instil Judaism among the prisoners, such as Passover seders and building a sukkah, earned him local press coverage. The adult bar mitzvah of a group of prisoners about 10 years ago made national Canadian television.

Rabbi Gottesman believes his troubles are an "act of God," a sign that the Lord wants him to "slow down" because "my work is done."

About two months before his arrest, he said he was in a serious car accident that demolished his car, but left him unhurt. Then, on the Friday before Sukkot, he was in another accident.

"Maybe now God is making me stop in order to save my life."

Scholarship to unite Israelis, Arabs, Canadians

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Funds raised in Canada during a visit here by Leah Rabin soon after her husband's assassination have established an annual scholarship program that will bring together a Jewish Israeli, an Arab from the Middle East and a Canadian of any background to study at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem for a year.

They will be known as the Rabin Scholars and be based at the Harry S. Truman Research Institute for the Advancement of Peace.

Leah Rabin spoke in Montreal and Toronto in 1996, raising $1.7 million through the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, with a view to creating a project in memory of her husband.

"I think this is the most important project I have ever touched," said Rabin scholarship chair Clara Balinsky, a Hebrew University governor, and veteran fundraiser and community activist.

Candidates for the scholarship must demonstrate "superior academic abilities as well as individual initiative and leadership skills." They must have at least a bachelor of arts degree from a Canadian, American or Middle Eastern university, completed in the last two years.

The Canadian scholar will be selected by a blue-ribbon committee of academics from across Canada, chaired by former Université de Montréal rector Rene Simard. A similar committee in Israel will pick the Middle East scholars.

The scholars will be enrolled in a specially designed visiting graduate program at the Rothberg International School. They may come from a variety of disciplines relating to the pursuit of peace, including political science, international relations, Middle East studies, economics or law.

Courses will be given in such topics as democracy and leadership and conflict resolution, as they relate to the Middle East situation and the objective of peace worldwide.

They will attend for a full academic year starting in October 1999, through to April. (The scholarship includes dormitory accommodation in Jerusalem, plus airfare for those coming from abroad.) Those who require it may start with a summer Hebrew ulpan (included in the scholarship). Course work will be in English and Hebrew.

The scholars will also take part in meetings with public figures and special events in the country.

Each will be expected to undertake a major project in their area of specialization, under tutorship of a senior Hebrew University professor. Each will be asked to write an article on their experience, which will be published in Canada and Israel, and to speak on behalf of the Rabin scholarship program in their own country.

Students to undertake major project

The program also foresees the appointed of a Rabin Distinguished Fellow, who will be chosen each year on the basis of outstanding research or involvement in the study of peace. He or she will spend three weeks to two months at the Hebrew University, and give guidance to the Rabin Scholars.

Balinsky said the committee is looking at some well-known Canadians, not necessarily associated with Middle East affairs, but highly respected for their public service or intellect. "They will bring attention and additional prestige to the Rabin scholarship program," she said.

Literature on the scholarship program will be distributed shortly in English, Hebrew and Arabic, to universities throughout North America and the Middle East.

For more information, contact Canadian Friends of Hebrew University. Feb. 15, 1999 will be the deadline for applications. The scholars are to be announced April 23.

CMDA honors Herb Gray with mobile medical unit

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A mobile intensive care unit was recently donated by Canadian Magen David Adom (CMDA) in honor of Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray.

At a recent ceremony held at Congregation Machzikei Hadas, Arthur Levitt, immediate past president of CMDA, spoke of his pride that Gray is a member of [the Ottawa Jewish] community.

Miriam Lang, CMDA president, said that the organization provides the only free ambulance service in Israel. One hundred percent of the blood supplied to the Israel Defence Forces and 92 percent of the blood supply in the entire country comes from Magen David Adom, she said.

Sam Litwack, Ottawa representative of CMDA, said that when an ambulance in Israel is being used to transport a pregnant woman to hospital, the drivers put a picture of a stork on the ambulance. He expressed the wish that Gray's ambulance always be covered with stork pictures.

Greetings were extended on behalf of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'ir by vice-president Shlomo Mayman. As the dedication took place just a few days after Simchat Torah, Mayman compared the continuous cycle of reading and re-reading the Torah to the constant need for new ambulances to replace the old ones.

Keys to ambulance

National ambulance chair and past president of CMDA, Irwin Beutel, presented the Pikuach Nefesh award to Gray, together with the keys to the new ambulance.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, said he was delighted that Gray is a member of Congregation Machzikei Hadas. "In [Gray's] life in Canada, he has been a life enhancer, and now in Israel he will be known as a life saver."

Gray spoke of the importance of pikuach nefesh, the saving of a soul, and of his pleasure in being associated with an organization devoted to saving lives.

He noted with pride that this mobile intensive care unit would be used to save the lives of Jews and Arabs alike in Israel.

Gray presented the ambulance keys to David Sultan, ambassador of Israel to Canada, who called Gray "a man of prominence, distinction and integrity."

Following the speeches, Rabbi Bulka sprinkled a few drops of wine on the ambulance to officially "launch" it. "I hope that every trip it takes will be a trip to generate a l'chaim," he said.

Cantor Pinchas Levinson led the singing of O Canada and Hatikvah. Joel Taller, vice-president of Machzikei Hadas, led in the recitation of prayers for Canada and Israel.

Israelis help in breakthrough in treating leukemia

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — A team of Israeli and Italian researchers has developed a technique that expands the donor pool for leukemia patients in need of bone marrow transplants.

Developed by scientists at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel and Perugia University in Italy, the method for obtaining and treating bone marrow eliminates the need to find a close donor-recipient match.

Leukemia – a group of cancer-like diseases of the blood cells affecting bone marrow and blood-forming tissues and organs – is generally treated with strong chemical and radiation therapies. Bone marrow transplantation, a painful procedure with a limited survival rate, is considered a last resort for terminal cases.

Until now, patients eligible for the radical therapy required a donor whose immune system matched theirs for six genetic markers – three from the father and three from the mother – to avoid rejection and other complications.

Bone marrow transplants

These restrictions meant that patients had to find matching donors among their siblings or among the general population, where a match is very rarely found.

Global registries have increased the odds of finding a match, but Jews and members of some other ethnic groups often have a difficult time finding suitable matches among the millions of names in the databases.

Since most patients have relatives who do not match on all six of the markers, but who can serve as bone marrow donors using the new technique, "advances in this area will greatly increase the availability of transplants as curative therapy," professors Yair Reisner of the Weizmann Institute and Massimo Martelli of Perugia University conclude in the Oct. 22 issue of the New England Journal of Medicine.

As a result of their work, patients can receive bone marrow transplants from donors matched along only three immunological markers, a partial match shared by parents and children.

Between siblings, there is a 75 percent chance of finding the vital correlation – and finding a partially compatible donor is also possible among extended family members, according to the Weizmann Institute.

Reisner sees big advantages with "mismatched" bone marrow transplants.

"When you don't have a donor, we can offer you something. You're not lost," he said in a telephone interview from Tel Aviv.

And for those waiting to locate an unrelated donor through a registry, he said, "we should be able to offer a solution immediately."

Bone marrow from unmatched donors carries the danger of triggering residual immunity in the recipient's blood that may reject the "foreign" marrow.

In other cases, the transplanted marrow works against its host in a reverse-rejection.

The Reisner-Martelli method attempts to overcome this problem through "megadoses" of donated stem cells, which are obtained by injecting the donor with special hormones and collected through a process called leukapheresis.

Those cells are "cleaned" of their immune-system agents, giving them a decent chance of being accepted.

The new technique is already being implemented in hospitals in Israel, the United States, Germany and Austria.

Martelli and Reisner, whose collaboration dates back to 1985, tracked the progress of 43 patients with acute forms of leukemia who received unmatched transplants between 1995 and 1997.

At the end of the study, the Israeli-Italian team reported results comparable to the outcomes from perfectly matched transplants.

Sixteen of the patients – none of whom had responded to other therapies – were free of the disease.

The remaining patients either relapsed or died of the disease or complications from the treatment.

"It's not a home run," said Claudio Anasetti, the director of the Unrelated Donor Marrow Transplant Program at the Fred Hutchinson Cancer Research Centre in Seattle, one of the world's foremost facilities. "But it's a big step towards how to get a transplant without too much toxicity."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I find that when I order pasta in a restaurant, they always bring a huge portion. What is an appropriate portion size for a main course pasta?

A. I would suggest approximately 1½ to 2 cups of pasta is an appropriate portion size for a main course. You are right. Many times in restaurants the portion can be twice that size. Try ordering an appetizer portion or sharing.

Q. What is the recommended amount of fat to eat per day for men and women?

A. This depends on whether you are trying to lose weight, gain weight or maintain weight; it also depends on individual health factors, such as your cholesterol level. However, the average recommendation for women maintaining weight is approximately 60-65 grams per day, and it is approximately 90 grams per day for men maintaining their weight.

Q. Is it true that when you are pregnant you are supposed to be "eating for two"?

A. No. My advice is that you may want to try to eat twice as healthy, but definitely not twice as much. This is going to vary considerably, however, from woman to woman. Some women experience much greater levels of hunger than others, and many women suffer with the opposite problem of nausea. In general, you only need a maximum of a few hundred additional calories per day.

Yossi Arditi. A Portrait in Courage.

'It was very dark outside, with not even the moon to give us light, when the Molotov Cocktail hit the centre of the Jeep; the bottle shattered all over us and started to burn us. I was trapped in the back seat, burning like a living torch. Everything was burning. I managed to get out of the jeep. I had burns all over my body. I was hospitalized for 10 months and had countless plastic surgery operations. Through it all, my wife, children, parents and friends were by my side.

I had to stay in bed for six months. During this time I was introduced to Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv. I initially visited the Centre for physiotherapy and then learned there were many more activities. Beit Halochem becAme my second home. Everyone made me feel very comfortable because everyone was in the same boat. I felt protected and cared for. I have no doubt that Beit Halochem helped me in the best way possible. There were times when they actually helped me forget my dreadful injuries.

From the bottom of my heart, I want to thank those who thought of the idea of establishing a place like Beit Halochem, for those of us who have suffered injuries and are now disabled. I want to thank those who manage it, and those who contribute to it with such generosity.'

Fanatics pose danger of new killings: Weizman

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — President Ezer Weizman warned last weekend of recent indications that another high-profile political murder in Israel – like the killing of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin – is not impossible.

"There is within our midst a small, fanatical, violent and dangerous nucleus, which scorns the laws of the state, and places above them its twisted understanding of religious injunctions," Weizman said during a memorial ceremony at his official Jerusalem residence.

On the third anniversary of his assassination by Yigal Amir, Rabin was mourned by several of the more prominent men with whom he had worked. Former Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Lt. Gen. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak spoke at a noontime memorial ceremony on the Hebrew University's Mount Scopus campus, while letters to the widowed Leah Rabin from Jordan's King Hussein and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat were read at the Weizman ceremony.

"Leah, my dear sister," wrote Hussein, "only distance and the state of my health prevent me from being with you on this sad day. The legacy left by my friend and partner, Yitzhak Rabin the lofty peacemaker, will live with us forever... He was a great man, and his absence is deeply felt."

The king closed his letter with an expression of his belief that Rabin's legacy would survive the journey from vision to reality. "Although Yitzhak is no longer with us," he wrote, "he remains in our hearts always. He is not the memory of the past, but the promise of the future."

Arafat called Rabin "my true partner in making the peace, the hard peace, the peace of the brave," giving Rabin, Weizman and Shimon Peres the credit for breaking through "the wall of hostility and hatred" that he said had separated the Israeli and Palestinian people for years.

Arafat said the peace camp was growing larger every day, and that the two nations would see their negotiations lead to peace and security for both sides. He also cited the recently-signed Wye Memorandum as a new chapter of the process begun by Yitzhak Rabin and himself.

The ceremony at Weizman's residence was well-attended – Labor Chair Ehud Barak was there, along with Peres, IDF Chief of Staff Lt. Gen. Shaul Mofaz, MK Rechavam Ze'evi (Moledet), and other Knesset members - but no cabinet ministers were present.

Leah Rabin said she was not bothered by that fact – "I didn't notice anyone missing their presence," she said.

The cabinet held its own memorial ceremony, as did the Knesset, and numerous cabinet members attended the Mount Herzl ceremony. Several also attended Saturday night's mass gathering in Tel Aviv's Yitzhak Rabin Square.

Also present at Weizman's home were the parents of a Jordanian child named Yitzhak Rabin. The family is currently living in Israel.

In his own speech, Weizman said that three years after the assassination, "I have no doubt that [Rabin's] vision was not murdered along with him, and that it will live eternally. Peace was Yitzhak's will, and I commit myself to fight with all my power to help actualize this will."

Leah Rabin said it was difficult for her to be at the president's home without her late husband, with whom she had attended so many ceremonies there. She also said she hoped the lighting of the memorial candle there would become an annual ceremony.

Lipkin-Shahak called on the university students he addressed to neutralize what he called "the social time bomb" of which Rabin's assassination was symptomatic. The general called on the students to muster the energy they were devoting to their strike to fighting the divisions within Israel. "Take care of this country," he said, "because we don't have any other land, and you are its future."

Shahak was approached after his speech by several students who called on him "to enter politics and save Israel. You are our last hope," some told him.

Shahak reminded his supporters, "I have not yet taken off my military uniform."

Prayer and study tents set up in the city to commemorate Rabin were visited by many Jerusalem mourners.

Police to crack down

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Attorney general Elyakim Rubinstein and state prosecutor Edna Arbel decided last week, following urgent consultations, to instruct the police to step up enforcement of laws against inciting, threatening and insulting civil servants.

At a meeting with senior police officers, senior officials in the state prosecutor's office, and other security officials, intelligence assessments were presented that suggest that incitement is likely to increase as the peace process progresses and the Wye agreement is implemented.

Sources at the meeting said that the calls of "traitor" lobbed at Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu by right-wing extremists must be met with decisive action.

One possibility raised at the meeting was the issue of administrative detention orders against extremist right-wing activists, but no decision was taken on the issue. A decision was made, however, to accelerate investigation and indictment against individuals suspected of incitement.

Rubinstein called on leaders from all political parties to work to cool down the atmosphere. He said that law enforcement authorities will play a role in monitoring activities, and will do everything necessary to enforce the law while preserving a balance between freedom of expression and deflecting the potential for violence.

The attorney general emphasized that the bitter experience of the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin mandates extra caution for addressing calls of "traitor," which could be interpreted as a call to violence.

University students on strike in Israel

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — The new academic year at universities throughout the country officially began two weeks ago, but the classrooms have remained empty.

About 175,000 university students from the Technion in Haifa, to Hebrew University in Jerusalem, to Ben-Gurion University in Beersheva have been on strike since Oct. 23.

The students are demanding a 50 percent cut in their tuition, which is now approximately NIS 10,000 ($3,600 Cdn) per year.

The students, who put their studies on hold because of their mandatory army duty, think the tuition, coupled with living costs, makes higher education less accessible to the masses.

"I think the strike is good," said 24-year-old Tali, who is working to save enough money for university. "I just hope they can accomplish something."

"I agree with the cause of the strike," said Lee Lamdan, a fourth year computer sciences student at the Technion in Haifa. "I think university is too expensive."

Lamdan, like others, also questioned the government's stance on paying yeshiva students to study, even though most of them do not serve in the army. "We should get what Haredim get," she said.

Adina Bercovich, a fourth year English and international relations student at Hebrew University agreed. "Why shouldn't I get the [haredi] accomodations?" Bercovich, asked. "I have to work part time and that still isn't enough money."

Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman has repeatedly rejected the students' demands, saying they are trying to break an agreement they themselves signed that set student tuition through the year 2001. Ne'eman said the students' demands would cost NIS 800 million ($290 million) and instead they should be assisted on an individual basis.

But Lior Rotbert, chair of the National Students Union, blamed Ne'eman for what is happening. "He is unaware of the students' difficulties and the seriousness of the situation," Rotbert said.

One year of university – including tuition, books, housing and cost of living – runs the average student NIS 40,000 ($14,500).

The strike has become a sort of political arena for politicians. Jerusalem mayoral candidate Shimon Shetreet used the strike to promote his election campaign with the younger voters.

"Your strike is real, justified, and right, and I want you to continue with more students. You deserve respect for asking them to reduce tuition by only 50 percent," Shetreet was quoted as saying in the Jerusalem Post.

Labor party leader Ehud Barak told students that "the state of Israel has no natural resource except the brains in your heads. The lowering of tuition is only the first step in the campaign which must end in every boy and girl... being able to take advantage of a university education, for the future of all of us."

Police drag away a screaming student demonstrator.

Referring to the existing agreement, Education Minister Yitzhak Levy said, "It's better to reconsider an agreement signed five years ago if things have changed economically and academically...We can talk about possibly establishing a new commitee to review the matter."

Meanwhile, the strike turned ugly early on as police and students clashed outside the universities. Photographs of students being clubbed and put in headlocks by police have received wide coverage in the Israeli papers.

"I think everyone is saddened to see such things," Ha'aretz quoted President Ezer Weizman as saying about the confrontations.

Student leader Rotbert maintained that the police were acting violently without provocation. "They hunt us down like animals," he said.

Students and police accuse each other

Police, on the other hand, have accused students of deliberately inciting violence in order to capture headlines.

Police Insp.-Gen. Yehuda Wilk said the students have a right to demonstrate, but added that they had ignored the requirement to obtain permits for demonstrations.

Lamdan sided with the police on the violence issue. "Some students do some things that should be stopped... some things are out of line," she said. "The roadblocks are okay, but the violence is too much."

The police, however, think even the roadblocks are too much of a disturbance. Drivers who honk their horns to identify with the strikers have found themselves the target of police action, as officers have handed out scores of tickets.

In addition, more than 100 students across the country have been arrested and detained by the police on a range of charges. The three student leaders of the strikes were charged last week with illegal assembly and incitement.

Another strike, this time by the professors, is already scheduled to take place.

"The only people who are suffering are us," said Lamdan. "We're already late... we'll be the ones paying for it."

A Wye compromise

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

The Wye Memorandum, signed by Israel and the Palestine Authority (PA) on Oct. 23 after nine days of tortuous negotiations, is basically an exercise in compromise.

It's clear that the agreement, designed to fulfil the unkept promises of the 1995 Oslo 2 accord, could not have been cobbled together unless both sides had relented on such key issues as the size of Israel's redeployment and security arrangements.

Under the accord, which broke a bitter 19-month impasse in negotiations, Israel agreed to give up a further 13 percent of the West Bank over a 12-week period in exchange for Palestinian security cooperation and a promise to conduct a systematic and sustained campaign against terrorism.

When the United States originally presented its plan in January to resuscitate the dying Oslo peace process, the Israeli government was less than enthusiastic about it. The cabinet, describing it as "unacceptable," claimed that a 13 percent withdrawal would endanger Israel's security. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu offered about nine percent.

Israel embraced the American proposal only after the PA agreed that three percent of the territory to be relinquished would be turned into a nature preserve in the Judean Desert under Israel's overriding security responsibility. By contrast, the Palestinians almost immediately embraced the American plan. But for the PA, it was still a bitter pill to swallow. It had expected Israel to vacate 90 percent in the interim period.

If the Wye Memorandum is implemented, 60 percent of the West Bank will be under Israel's full control and 18.2 percent will be fully controlled by the Palestinians. Another 21.8 percent is to be jointly administered. The 40 percent due to fall under the total or partial authority of the PA contains more than 95 percent of the Arab population, but is virtually non-contiguous, a source of discontent in Palestinian circles. On a map, the land to be under Palestinian suzerainty resembles nothing less than an archipelago, all the easier for Israel to regulate.

As of now, the question of the third redeployment remains unresolved. The PA wanted it rolled into the first and second pullbacks, which are integrated into the Wye Memorandum, but Israel balked. A joint committee will study the contentious issue. The PA expects a substantial withdrawal, but will have to settle for less than two percent.

On security cooperation, the Palestinians made the bulk of the concessions, pledging yet again to uphold a policy of "zero tolerance" toward terrorism. But in a notable concession, Netanyahu dropped his demand that Arab terrorists in Palestinian self-rule areas be extradited to Israel.

The U.S. Central Intelligence Agency is supposed to play a major role in monitoring and validating Palestinian compliance. But does that mean that the United States will be the final arbiter in security matters? This could cause tension in the future.

One of Israel's demands was that the PA should reduce its police forces from about 40,000 to 30,000. But all Israel got from last month's accord was an innocuous paragraph that the Palestinians would provide "a list of its policemen...in conformity with the prior agreements."

After three years of delay, the Palestinians will finally be allowed to open an airport in the Gaza Strip. But the PA is still waiting for permission to build a port in Gaza, a matter that hinges on the successful completion of additional bilateral talks.

As for the release of Palestinian prisoners, the PA asked for 3,000 but got only 700.

The spirit of compromise was also evident in negotiations regarding the PLO's national covenant. Netanyahu insisted that the Palestinian National Council (PNC) be recalled to nullify all articles in the charter calling on Israel's destruction (a process which actually occurred in April 1996). But in the end, he backed down and accepted a meeting of "the members" of the PNC to deal with that recurring problem.

ANNOUNCING

THE BRONFMAN YOUTH FELLOWSHIPS IN ISRAEL 1999

For the thirteenth consecutive summer, a group of outstanding Jewish teenagers in the U.S. and Canada, coming from a wide variety of backgrounds and entering the twelfth grade of school, will be recipients of the Bronfman Youth Fellowships*. They will spend five fulfilling weeks of study, dialogue and travel in Israel.

The Bronfman Fellows will be selected on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities. Merit, not financial need, is the program's selection standard. Fellowship activities begin June 28th, with a return from Israel August 4th. All meals will be kosher, and Sabbath activities will be in keeping with the sanctity of the day.

Based in Jerusalem, the Fellows will engage in an intense interaction with a diverse rabbinic faculty and counselors, representing a wide range of Jewish perspectives. They will explore Jewish texts against the background of Israel's land, culture and customs ... take part, at a time of rapid change, in seminars with some of the country's leading political and cultural figures ... debate ideas and search for insights on the different ways to define oneself as a Jew today, all in an atmosphere of mutual respect and open dialogue.

The purpose: to return home with a new understanding of the myriad issues facing the Jewish people and the Jewish state, and a new appreciation of the need for dialogue among Jews of all kinds.

* Fellowships cover all expenses including roundtrip transportation between New York and Israel, room and board and travel in Israel.

Mephisto footwear for autumn walks

In parks and along sidewalks, autumn trees blaze red and gold. During these brief early autumn weeks, no activity gives more all-round pleasure than walking. You use not just your feet and legs, but your entire body. Your senses and mind are lively, tuned to new impressions.

When you relax after your walk, you enjoy all-round wellbeing, with mind and body stimulated, yet refreshed. And one of the keys to this total wellbeing is footwear. Your feet have to enjoy walking as much as the rest of you does.

These days, before going out, you make sure your clothes are warm enough. You also have to clothe your feet appropriately. If they're comfortable, so are your ankles, legs, hips and back — indeed, your whole body. And here's where Mephisto makes the difference.

Mephisto footwear offers you the ultimate in comfort and durability. Every Mephisto shoe, boot or sandal is made from natural materials and hand finished; and there are dozens of comfortable choices for every activity — formal, casual, relaxed or vigorous.

This freedom of choice has become increasingly important. Women especially reject the fashion tyranny which once decreed pinched toes and aching ankles; with growing health consciousness, everyone wants shoes that look smart and feel right. In meeting this demand, Mephisto leads.

The Ranch model, from the Slacker line, is the ultimate light-weight trekking boot for the unconventional, adventurous man or women.

In the sporty Runoff line, the Match shoe for men and women features anatomically shaped removable insoles and unique double air bags which reduce shock by 60 percent. In models like Columbia shoes for women, the Trampolins, Europe's most popular walking shoes, feature latex midsole cushioning, air bag shock absorbers, Multigrip soles, all-round padding and anatomically shaped insoles.

The lightweight men's and women's Marcelo, from the Air-Jet line, is the ultimate shoe for city and country walking. And models like the Goodyear line's Melchior are as well-crafted as they are stylish.

To find the footwear for your needs and tastes, call Mephisto's Canadian director Ralph Benisty, at (905) 881-0050; he welcomes the opportunity to advise you. Or visit one of Mephisto's three GTA locations, listed below.

Essence du Papier: Paper and more

Our era is one of automation, mass production and impersonal communication. At the same time, there's a nostalgic rediscovery of forgotten pleasures in sending cards, exchanging letters, and taking up a pen to shape words with one's own hand. And this discovery has increased the demand for quality writing materials.

Essence du Papier carries fine paper for every use from writing and wrapping to collages or scrapbooks. There are fine writing instruments too, from Mont Blanc, Sheaffer, Parker, Lamy and Sensa, and even hand-blown Venetian glass pens to help your word flow onto the page.

Essence du Papier's expanding range of products includes much more — albums and scrapbooks, for example. Immortalize family celebrations and traditions in a beautiful, hand-made album by Nina M., Jill Schwartz or Constance Kay.

Do you need a journal or day timer? Besides Filofax and Letts of London, Essence du Papier now carries the PTM line, with its large selection of options to help plan your daily life.

Old-world sealing wax and signets from French Corner add a special touch to menus, announcements and invitations. And if this helps make your ceremonies and parties unique, think what it adds to a billet doux, or letter to a special friend.

Essence du Papier imports products from around the world, many of them hand-made. Many, you'll find at no other Toronto store. Some — like the fine leather photo albums from Italy, or the desk accessories made in France from Canadian maple — you won't find anywhere else in Canada.

Many products feature Jewish themes, including greeting cards for weddings, Bar and Bat Mitzvahs, and stationery with Jewish motifs.

When a special event is in the offing, you want the invitations to be the best: they create that crucial first impression. Let Essence du Papier's computerized Crane Emporium system help you design invitations for all themes, secular and religious. Have your printing done in-store too, with laser or ink-jet printers, on papers and vellum from quality suppliers like Anna Griffin and Tocatta.

And the service is as fine as the stock on the shelves. Call David Grant at 416-932-0109; or step through Essence du Papier's French doors at 2476 Yonge St. at Castlefield, and see for yourself.

Sutton Group Admiral: a smart choice for serious real estate professionals

Toronto real estate Brokers extraordinaire, Sol & Murray Goldkind, are early risers. Their days are generally filled with meetings and interviews — many with top agents interested in joining their rapidly growing real estate company.

As real estate brokers, the Goldkinds learned early in their management career that success would come as a result of hard work and dedication to their agents. "What an agent really wants most is to affiliate with the right company, sell as much real estate as they can with the fewest headaches possible," says Murray. "Every top agent we talk to is interested in one primary thing: making more money. But they also want their independence," notes Sol. According to the Goldkinds, the real estate industry is in a massive transition with agents segregating themselves into definable groups. Top agents no longer are looking for the highly structured management styles popular in the 70's and 80's. Now, the top agents are moving to more service-oriented, less structured environments — exactly the kind of productive atmosphere the Goldkinds see themselves providing.

Murray Goldkind

Sol Goldkind

Many of the changes occurring in real estate today are directly attributable to two factors: advancements in technology, and the availability of agent-oriented marketing resources. The technological advancements over the past decade equate to more freedom for the smart agent. Many of the Goldkinds' staff also maintain home offices and are able to be fully functional from their home environment. Through computer link-ups, and the Sutton Group Admiral website (www.sutton.ml.org), information that once was available only by going to the office is now available anywhere and at any time.

Many agents like the idea of being productive without having to be in the office every day. When they are in the office, agents with Sutton Group Admiral all have access to the latest computer facilities, and enjoy full use of the latest in personal marketing and career management software. Sutton Group Admiral uses a "fee-for-service" concept, which lets agents pick and choose the services they want. In this way there are never any hidden costs passed on to an agent, nor are agents ever penalized by waste generated by others. In other words, each agent, acting as his or her own businessperson, enjoys the benefit of controlling their income and their expenses. "In the old days, top agents concentrated nearly exclusively on their income, but today the smart agents are looking just as strongly at their bottom line," says Murray.

The Sutton Group Admiral advantage offers a serious real estate agent the best of all worlds. More money in their pocket, freedom to operate at their own level, flexibility in business planning, and access to tools and services. Says Sol, "timing isn't everything, it's just 98%, and as timing goes we are comfortable that we have the concept agents are looking for both now and in the future."

Judging by the phenomenal growth of their 70+ person office, the Goldkinds' success story is one of the very few Cinderella stories in the hard-nosed real estate industry.

Sol and Murray Goldkind, owners of Sutton Group Admiral Realty Inc., are very pleased to announce the recent appointment of as Associate Manager and Sales Representative. Since 1978 Heather has consistently been a Sales Performance Leader while providing the community with the utmost in service, professionalism and integrity.

Israel concerned over unfair airline competition

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian and Israeli negotiators are attempting to hammer out a new agreement over air traffic between the two countries.

Representatives of the transport ministries of both countries are focusing on a temporary agreement to take the two parties through the winter season and pave the way for talks on a broader agreement, said Moshe Shamai, general manager of El Al operations in Canada. An interim agreement is expected at any time.

Shamai said El Al is unhappy at the current bilateral agreement, which was signed in 1985 and which has become obsolete. That agreement was concluded at a time when no Canadian airline was interested in flying the Canada-Israel route. Under the agreement, El Al is forced to balance its departures to Israel between Toronto and Montreal, even though Toronto has developed into a much bigger market.

In addition, El Al is prevented from originating its flights in the larger United States market and simply topping them up with Canadian passengers. Air Canada, which also flies to Israel, is not bound by those terms, Shamai said.

"Air Canada is using Toronto and Montreal as 'hubs.' We don't have the same advantage. We have no rights to take Americans to Israel," Shamai said.

"Israel," he continued, "is concerned over unfair competition. Any agreement has to reflect equal opportunity." Under the current agreement, El Al must make specific requests from Canada to exclude being bound by its terms, he added.

According to a report in Ha'aretz, Israel gave Canada notice that it was terminating the aviation agreement after Air Canada announced it was adding two flights per week to Israel during the winter season, bringing to five the number of weekly flights to the Jewish state.

El Al flies to Israel three days a week during the winter season.

Show revives Terezin children's songs

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The accidental discovery of poems and songs written by children in the Terezin ghetto has led to the first North American production in Toronto of The Flower Horse.

The whimsical pieces were heard in Prague by John Freund of Toronto, a survivor, who brought a small cassette recording of the pieces to Helena Fine, producer of Magical Basket Productions.

Fine researched the Terezin material, which was written in the ghetto, and first performed there by the children. The purpose of The Flower Horse, written by Norbert Fryd and Karel Reiner, both survivors of Auschwitz and Dachau, was to give hope to the children that a better day was coming.

Fine is so entranced with The Flower Horse that she thinks it will rival the popularity of the opera Brundibar, also based on material from Terezin, which was seen by 10,000 children in Toronto.

About 1,200 children from Hebrew day schools and public schools are expected to attend the 45-minute performance of The Flower Horse.

Twenty children, mostly Jewish, have been rehearsing for three months to present the show. They come from all over the GTA, "and some have even learned to sing the songs in Czech," said Fine.

The poems, which repeat the themes of the songs, are translated into English, and the story of how The Flower Horse came to be, is told in English by Czech actor Tomas Nasek.

The author's brother, Jan Fryd, an aspiring medical student, died at the hands of the Nazis in 1942. Close friends of the Fryds named their newborn son, Jan, in his memory. The writer's gift to the new baby was a plain home-made toy, the flower horse. The title is taken from the name of the small cloth horse with a flower pattern.

The Flower Horse is being presented at the Jewish Book Fair in the Leah Posluns Studio Theatre, Nov. 8 to 12 at various times.

Although primarily for children, adults are invited to the Sunday, Nov. 8 performance at 1:00 p.m., though there may also be adult seats available for an earlier show at 10 a.m. Admission is $10 for adults.

The play will also be presented at Holy Blossom Temple, Nov. 15 at 10 a.m., followed by a free screening of the PBS documentary Voices of the Children. Its producer, Zuzana Justman, of New York, who was in the Terezin ghetto as a child, will be on hand to answer questions.

Prices for this performance are $10 adults and $5 children, with everyone invited to the free video screening at 11 a.m.

Relaxing on a Mediterranean cruise

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

THE RIVIERA — Imagine being pampered aboard a floating spa, where calm blue waters and exotic ports of call soothe the mind, body and soul.

Windsurf, Windstar Cruises' newest luxury ship, boasts a spa that offers a broad selection of treatments, including facials, body wraps, massage, water therapy, hair and nail care, and exercise programs.

After an aromatherapy massage on the shores of the Italian Riviera, one can have a makeover in Monaco – perfect for those wanting to look fabulous at The Casino at Monte Carlo.

Enjoying a spa bath on Wind Surf. [Windstar Cruises]

The day after, winners and losers alike can indulge in a facial, overlooking the beautiful beaches of the South of France.

Other offerings onboard the five-mast, 612-ft. Windsurf, catering to 312 guests, include two restaurants, a cafe, bar, lounge, fitness and aerobics centre, watersports platform, two pools, two hot tubs, casino, library and an open bridge, from which guests can observe the vessel sailing.

The 125 state-of-the-art cabins and 31 deluxe suites, all with outside views, are equipped with color television, VCR, CD player, safe, mini- bar and refrigerator, and full bathroom amenities.

Each cabin has an international direct-dial telephone. However, unless you break the bank at Monte Carlo, at $16 (US) per minute, you may want to call the folks at home, at port.

The Windsurf summers in the Mediterranean, and winters in the Caribbean. Well informed staff can organize affordable port excursions or offer valuable tips for those who prefer to explore on their own.

During its inaugural season, the Windsurf sailed once a week from Nice, France. Many of the ship's guests spend time before or after the cruise in Nice.

An easy way to discover Nice, is on the Little Tourist Train. This 45-minute guided tour, costing 30 FF (3.6 FF per Cdn. $), departs from the sea front. The tour includes a visit to Old Town, the market and the Castle Hill. Nice has 300 hectares of parks, gardens and woods. This historic city, once governed under Italy, is known for its museums such as The Fine Arts Museum and The National Marc Chagall Museum.

Another Windsurf port is Portofino, on the Italian Gulf of Tigullio, 36 km east of Genoa. This tiny town is nestled between the cliff and the sea, and has 2,000 residents. In the summer the population swells to 30,000.

Along the water's edge, the homes of former fishermen have been transformed into picturesque real estate investments for the wealthy.

Hikers will love the panoramic view of the opulent yachts from Mount Portofino. Ferries will take you to San Fruttuosos's beaches or the quaint resort of Santa Margherita Ligure.

Potoferraio, a charming town on the island of Elba, was the place of exile of Napoleon Bonaparte. History buffs should check out the emperor's two forts, Forte Falcone and Port Stella, and his official residence, Villa Dei Molini.

From Portovenere, an excursion is offered to Florence. Your day begins with a leisurely 2½- hour drive through the rolling Tuscany countryside. This cultural city, divided by the Arno River, was the birthplace of Léonardo di Vinci and Michelangelo. Sights to see include the Uffizi Gallery, Duomo, Pitti Palace and the Ponte Vecchio.

Attractions in Monaco include the Exotic Garden, Oceanographic Museum and National Museum, and the daily changing of the guard. Although you never need to dress up onboard, many don their finest for an evening at The Casino.

Former Torontonian scores many hits

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Word went out among professional songwriters in Los Angeles that Barbra Streisand was looking for a particular type of song. So it was precisely that type of song that former Torontonian John Capek was busy writing when The CJN contacted him recently in Los Angeles.

A professional songwriter, Capek intended to send his song to Streisand's recording company to see if it might get beyond Streisand's gatekeepers to the star herself.

"Every time I write a song, it's like buying a lottery ticket," he said. "There are no guarantees in this business. It's an incredibly insecure profession."

Nonetheless, Capek has scored some huge successes over the years. His song, Rhythm of My Heart became a hit for Rod Stewart, and he has composed hits for Joe Cocker, Chicago, Cher and Olivia Newton-John.

"Songwriting is a respectable living like any other profession. I work as hard as a doctor or lawyer – it's at that level. Only it's insecure because you may have success for a few years, and then nothing."

A former musician in the Canadian band Rough Trade, Capek estimates he has composed more than a thousand songs. He does not write lyrics. For a song he wrote for Newton-John, the lyrics were composed by Toronto singer-composer Amy Sky. For the past 20 years, Capek's usual songwriting partner has been Sky's husband, Toronto-based musician-composer Marc Jordan.

"There is a Canadian sense of lyrics that is quite different than American," Capek said. "The Canadian lyrics come out of the folk music tradition and out of poetry – for example, Leonard Cohen and Joni Mitchell. Ninety-five percent of the time I find myself writing with Canadians, even when I'm living here, just because they seem to write better words."

There are a preponderance of Jews in the songwriting industry in Los Angeles, Capek said. "In Los Angeles we come from a tradition that was established by Irving Berlin, George Gershwin, Jerome Kern and a whole string of others who were the pioneers of American popular music."

His own reasons for choosing a musical path emerged from his Jewish upbringing, he said. "My parents are Holocaust survivors and they were in Auschwitz…So I sort of rejected the straight and narrow path in life and chose music as a way of dealing with the dark aspects of humanity."

Capek was born in Prague but grew up in Australia, where he received a strong education in classical music. He lived in Toronto from 1973 to 1981 and is still a frequent visitor here. His Toronto friends include the folksinger Batsheva.

"Timing is everything in the songwriting business. In my case, I'm writing songs that are a little bit ahead of the fashion, so they may get picked up in a year or two.

"There are a lot of songs being written today that I would describe as 'corporate' – such as the songs that Celine Dion records. They seem to be written to a formula without great inspiration. There's an art to writing that formula which I don't have. I wish I did."

At the opposite end of the popular musical spectrum, he says, are "songs written for extremely young people. These are the songs that my 10-year-old daughter listens to – the Spice Girls and urban black music, things like that. There's very little traditional popular music being written at the moment."

The tunes that professional songwriters call "copyright songs" are few and far between, according to Capek. These are numbers that make an immediate impact and are remembered for years.

"When I listen to the radio there aren't a lot of songs I hear that I know I'll feel nostalgic about in five years. It goes in cycles and we're currently in a dry period."

Capek has hopes, however, that Streisand will record his composition and give him a "copyright song" that he and the rest of the world will remember for a long, long time to come.

Canada-Israel Fund yields high returns

The Canada-Israel Opportunity Fund was established in 1995 when a group of Canadian investors led by Paul Morton raised $7.5 million to invest in Israeli private and public equity funds.

In 1998, a follow-up fund was created, bringing the value of the funds up to approximately $15 million.

The funds are managed in Israel by Dorvat, Shem, Israel's leading independent investment and merchant banking group.

"We believe that these funds provide a unique opportunity for Canadian investors to participate in Israel's lucrative investment environment specifically in the high-tech area," says Morton.

The fund has yielded excellent returns to its investors, gaining 40 percent since its inception.

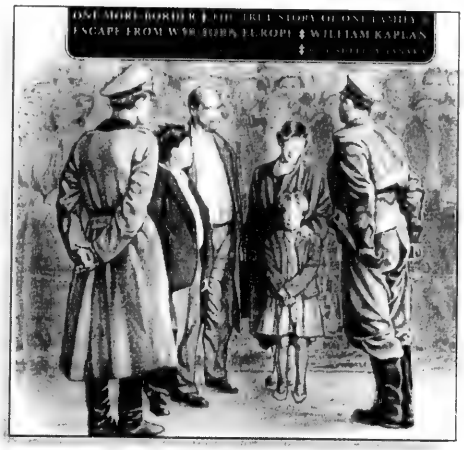
A true story of escape from the Holocaust to Canada

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor



Terrible things happened to Jews during World War II in Europe.

The leader of Nazi Germany was Adolf Hitler, who wanted to rid the world of Jews.

At the start of World War II, in 1939, Igor was a young boy – a preteen – living with his little sister Nomi and his parents in Lithuania, a small country close to Russia.

After Germany invaded Poland, Igor's father Bernard, knew that the Nazis would also invade Lithuania. If that happened, Igor's family – like that of all the Jews – would quickly be rounded up and sent to a concentration camp.

Igor's father decided to escape the advancing Nazis and go to Canada where Igor's Oma and Opa (grandfather and grandmother) lived.

William Kaplan's book One More Border (Groundwood Book) tells the true story of the author's father (Igor) and his family's escape from the Germans.

It was not easy. First Igor's father had to get emigration visas to leave Lithuania. They then had to travel across the vast width of Russia from Moscow to Vladivostok by train – a trip that lasted 10 days.

It was a dangerous journey. Each time the Russian police asked to check the visas, Igor's father worried that they would not be allowed to continue their journey. The Communists who ruled Russia at the time were also not very friendly to the Jews.

Finally they made it to a seaport in Vladivostok, which is on the far side of Russia on the Pacific Ocean.

But their journey was not yet over. Igor's mother had to sell all her possessions including her wedding ring in order to take a ship from Russia to Japan.

From Japan, Igor's family hoped they could board another ship, this one to Vancouver and from there another very long train ride to Ontario where Opa and Oma lived.

One of the nice things about this book is there is a map you can use to follow Igor's trek from Lithuania to Ontario.

Also, in addition to many beautiful drawings by Stephen Taylor, there are many photographs and sidebars.

These sidebars help you understand the story by telling you about all the places Igor travelled to, the animals he saw and types of people he would have met. There are also photographs of Igor and his family.

Another neat thing is you won't have to bother your parents with any words you don't understand. A glossary at the back of the book explains the meanings of some words you may not have read before.

Putting all the pieces together

TORONTO — Kubim building bricks, children's locking bricks that are the size of real bricks, are making their world debut here.

What sets Kubim – manufactured by IPU Industries Ltd. in Israel – apart from all others is a special plyurethane formula that make the bricks soft, pliable, lightweight, yet strong.

Kubim building bricks are safe, non-toxic and recyclable, and children can not tear them or bite off pieces to swallow.

A vanilla gum fragrance has been added to the multi-colored bricks, and because they are water resistant they can be left outside and washed when they get dirty.

Kubim building bricks come in three sets of 32, 64 or 96 pieces. As well, a 32-piece accessory set of angled bricks is available.

Business Profile

Leslie Greenberg:

Communications company provides total solution

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

Leslie Greenberg, president of Multinet Communications, whose office is in the company's Canadian headquarters in St-Laurent, Que., knows the business from the ground up.

Greenberg, 41, has always been good with his hands and started the business with his younger brother Nelson in 1986 working as a "techie" on the road. While still holding a seat on the board of directors, Nelson has since moved on to other business ventures, leaving Greenberg to run what has now become the largest privately held interconnect company in Canada.

Multinet's mission is to provide their clients with a total solution for their telecommunication requirements. Multinet Communications sells, services and installs telephone hardware, software, voice processing systems and peripheral software packages, and most recently, video conferencing, all to enhance productivity.

The company offers a complete line of voice processing solutions. Multinet's technical expertise will apply solutions tailor-made to each individual customer's needs through complete Interactive Telephone Information Systems including electronic receptionist, voice mail, Audiotex, call processing and voice recognition. They have just been appointed as an authorized dealer of Sony Video Conferencing equipment.

"Our market is anyone in business who needs a phone system," says Greenberg. From offices located in Quebec City, Ottawa, Toronto, Calgary and from its head office in Montreal, Multinet has over 6,000 clients from coast to coast.

The Multinet Group consists of the following companies: Multinet Communications Inc., Astro, Telefficite and LANimation Inc.

When a new customer calls, Greenberg dispatches one of his staff of 100 to do a complete assessment of the client's needs. Each system is configured individually and tailor-made for the customer. Multinet handles the sales, installation and employee training. Their industry hallmark is after-sales service and maintenance with a 24-hour, 365-day service line. All technical services are in-house, enabling Multinet to provide the fastest response times and highest quality of service.

Leslie Greenberg

Greenberg takes the long view. "We want to establish an on-going relationship with our customers. We strive to provide solutions for them to help their growth and of course hopefully as they grow, they will grow with us." He is proud that his company services any and all organizations that need phone systems. There is no standard Multinet customer. Clients may require two to 2,000 telephone sets or two to 5,000 voice mail boxes. Two of Multinet's largest national accounts are Zellers and Forzani Group (sports experts).

To those who say they are tired of answering machines and automated processing systems, Greenberg says, "Our studies show us that 60 to 70 percent of calls businesses receive are non-revenue generating, such as for general inquiries or personal calls. Being put on hold or being left open-ended by a human being is not providing better service. Having the facility to leave a detailed message will provide closure for your customers."

Multinet's goal is to enable their clients to achieve maximum efficiency. By developing effective phone systems, Greenberg encourages his clients to save their employees time for direct customer service, thereby creating more opportunities to generate greater revenues leading to increased profitability.

Multinet is proud to be a truly Canadian company. It supports Canadian manufacturers and is recognized by both Nortel and Mitel as their largest distributors in the eastern region, as well as by Vox, a leading Canadian voice mail system manufacturer. Direct competition for Multinet Communications comes from Bell. But Greenberg is convinced that he and his team provide better service, better prices and better technical support.

"I am a solution provider," says Greenberg, "and I am always accessible. My clients can call and speak directly to the president."

Technology is changing quickly in the communications industry. Multinet has responded by creating a separate research and development laboratory at its head office, to ensure that customers benefit from the latest in telecommunications technology. Greenberg is excited by the newest breakthrough, called convergence, when computers and telephones come together.

"More and more we are seeing a shift to PC-based products," says Greenberg.

Multinet is looking to the future to continue providing the highest quality equipment and service to its growing list of customers. Multinet Communications recently opened its newest office in Laval, Que.

A priority for Greenberg is making time to give something back to the community that has supported his company's growth. "It is important to give non-profit organizations a break."

A diabetic, Greenberg actively supports the Juvenile Diabetes Foundation. Within the Jewish community, he is involved with both the Westbury and West Island Ys and B'nai Brith. A Dollard-des-Ormeaux resident, he and his wife Gail have two young sons, Adam and Jake.
